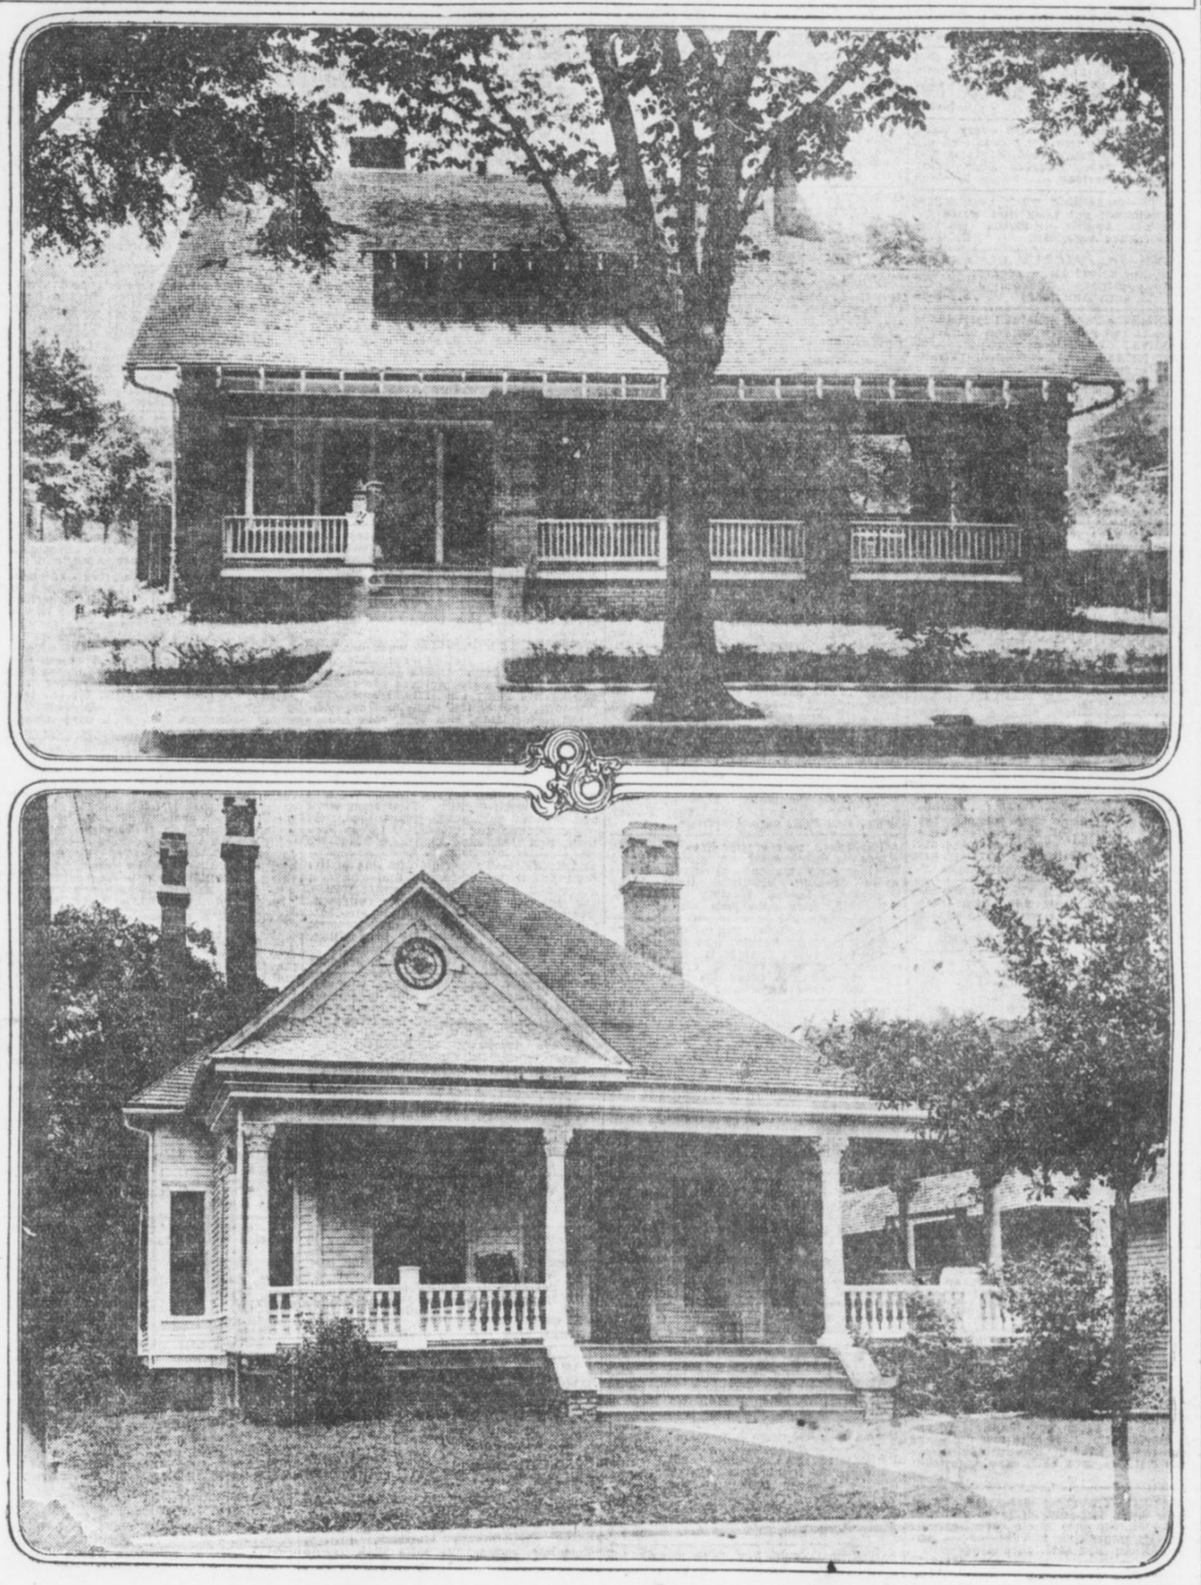
Rebirth of Broad Street Predicted by Realty Men

Demand That City Buy Little Triangles for Parks

ATTRACTIVE HOMES IN WEST END SECTION



Above are shown two homes which are regarded as typical of the latter-day construction which has invaded West End. The dwelling at the top is located on Gordon Street, and the one at the bottom is on Ashby Street. Despite the tendency of West End folk to invade the North Side, many old residents have remained in the section where they have lived so long. Dwellings of the war-time type, with their prim architecture, spacious yards and spreading shade trees, furnish a striking contrast to the modern type of house, with its smaller floor space and decreasing depth and width of lawn.

Removal of Produce Houses Causes Gossip Over Character of Improvements—Owners Have Held Long and Won't Sell.

What is going to happen to Broad Street, now that the commission houses are preparing to occupy the concrete building provided for their exclusive use on "Produce Row?" Will this thoroughfare from Hunter Street northward to Marietta Street become a thriving addition to the Peachtree and Whitehall retail districts and rival in growth and importance its neighbor on the west—Forsyth Street? Real estate men think it will, and they base their prediction on the location and the surroundings of the thoroughfare.

Many business houses have passed Broad Street by because of the unusual conditions that have beset it. In the first place, buildings were mostly old and unsightly. This was particularly true of North Broad between Marietta Street and the railroad. The commission houses found it possible to get places close to the railroad at comparatively low prices. They moved in. Other businesses not compatible with poultry and vegetables went elsewhere. Owners of buildings found the rentals insufficient to justify extensive improvements, and consequently limited their outlays. Buildings continued smoke-covered from year to year.

Broad's Peculiar Situation.

The result has been that while Broad Street has contributed a fair portion to the city's commercial advancement, its pulse has continued to beat below normal. It has had no rejuvenating influence to compare with that of Forsyth Street, of Marietta Street, Edgewood Avenue or Walton Street. Property on South Broad worth $20,000 has brought as little as $35 a month rent, which represents a discrepancy and an anomaly that is hard to explain.

Now, all this, declare the well-informed real estate men, is to be changed. Broad Street, by every circumstance of its location and environment, should be a valuable adjunct to Whitehall, Peachtree and tributary thoroughfares. It is purely central property, and very valuable at that, and it will get sooner or later improvements befitting its situation among its sister streets. The produce merchants are likewise improving their condition with much more desirable and adequate quarters, so the change will work a two-fold advantage.

CAREER OF JOHN H. JAMES READS MUCH LIKE FICTION

Probably no figure stands out more prominently in local financial circles than John H. James, who, it has been announced, will sell soon his former home at 314 Peachtree. Mr. James has made hundreds of thousands through banking, real estate and stock and bond operations. He has lost them and made them over again, and now he is considered comfortably situated. Mr. James is 83 years old and came to Atlanta over sixty years ago from the neighborhood near Stockbridge and began operations. He bought extensively along Peachtree. The block in which the Winecoff Hotel and "The House That Jack Built" are situated, bounded by East Ellis, Peachtree and North Forsyth Street and Carnegie Way, was bought for $2,500 and sold for $15,000. To-day it is worth probably $750,000, without improvements. He built a home on the old site of the Capital City Club and sold it at a great sacrifice. Having built the present Governor's Mansion, he lived in it several years and sold it 42 years ago for $100,000. To-day this is worth about $500,000.

Architects Locate Finest Buildings

NEW YORK, July 5.—According to a canvass by the American Federation of Arts of artists and leaders in the American art world, nine out of twenty public buildings in the United States which led in a list of the most satisfactory works of architecture were in New York City.

In order of choice they were the new Public Library, the Pennsylvania Railroad station, Columbia University library, J. P. Morgan's art museum, Madison Square Garden, St. Patrick's Cathedral, Cathedral of St. John the Divine, the City Hall and William K. Vanderbilt's home on Fifth Avenue.

Following the initial twenty were the Metropolitan Tower, the University Club and Trinity Church.

Small Strips Left by Subdivisions Can Be Had for Song—Later They Become "Close-in" and Are Big Menace to Tariff.

Property owners who are exponents of the civic beauty plan for Atlanta are expected to start soon a concerted improvement to carry out their program. They want a commission or board with enough money to improve parks and create new ones; to widen streets and straighten them; to plant trees and provide caretakers for them.

A public-spirited citizen declared the other day that $1,000,000 was needed at once to do this work, and that he expected to bring it to the attention of the city council in a manner that would compel notice. Other matters out of the way, he declared, council could give its attention to this and the trouble would be well worth while.

Prominent in the general plan for improvement is the proposed acquisition of various little triangles by the city. These, it is contended, can be had in the early days of their existence at a trifling sum, and oftimes for nothing, when years later they become almost priceless, and as they stand are a distinct menace to traffic. They are wanted first for parks, and later to widen streets.

POULTRY

Southern farmers are neglecting the most profitable end of the fowl industry. Pekin Duck is the best all-round fowl for the market producer. Indian Runners are great layers.

By JUDGE F. J. MARSHALL.

There is but little question that the domestic duck originated from the wild duck which was widely distributed over the British Islands.

It has fallen to the lot of England and America to do most of the perfecting of the tame varieties, although one, the Pekin, was imported from China in a rather crude state.

At this time we have a dozen standard varieties of ducks.

The duck, while not nearly so commonly bred as the chicken, has great commercial importance in some sections of this country. In Philadelphia, Boston and New York it is a favorite with epicures.

Its principal market role is in the shape of what are called broilers or green roasters. As such they use the larger varieties—the Pekin, Aylesbury and Rouen. These ducks will weigh as high as 17 pounds to the pair at maturity.

Ducks on Farms.

Although but little attention has been paid to them by farmers, a good class of ducks could be made a very profitable addition to the farm stock. So many farmers, particularly in the South, have tried to keep the old puddle duck, as they were called, and derived but little revenue from them. Where they have gotten some of the fine breeds, they have found them money-makers.

The Pekin, as Americanized, is our most profitable market duck. As they stand to-day, they represent nearly three-fourths of the commercial duck business of this country.

New York, New Jersey and Massachusetts have breeders who raise these ducks by the thousands to be marked at from two to three months of age. They grow twice as fast as would a chicken during this time.

While the Aylesbury and the Rouen will make as large a growth, it has been thought that the Pekin takes less time, and for that reason they have been universally used for market purposes.

E. W. Fly, of Chalfont, Pa., writes for The Reliable Poultry Journal, telling of the remarkable growth of ducks as compared with chickens. It requires about three months for the average chick to reach two pounds, while ducks will reach that weight in less than half that time, and are ready for the market in seven weeks.

Ducks More Profitable.

In experiments conducted for the purpose of determining the relative value of ducks and chicks, it was found that at the end of nine weeks the average weight of the ducks was four pounds and 8 ounces, average weight of chicks two pounds. Ten ducks sold for 28 cents a pound, or $12.60. After paying the shipping expenses, the receipts were $9.68. The food cost $2.36, leaving a net income of $7.32. The chicks sold for 24 cents a pound, the receipts being $2.74; cost of food was 82 cents, leaving a profit of $2.92. The difference in profit in favor of the ducks was $4.40.

Repeated tests have clearly shown that the Pekin or any of the larger breeds will make wonderful growth if they are properly fed and handled. Of course, they must be of a healthy strain, uninjured by being bred to fancy points. Good, strong outcrosses are necessary to the vigor of any variety.

James Rankin, of Massachusetts, one of the first poultrymen of this country to take up the production of early market ducks, after experimenting with all kinds, says that the Pekin will yield the most profits. As he raises over 12,000 ducks yearly, a variation of 1 cent per pound will make a difference of $500 in his yearly income.

Early Ducks Make Early Layers.

Mr. Rankin not only puts a lot of early roasters on the Boston market, but he keeps over a lot of these for early layers the following fall and winter. It is as essential for him to have the early layers as the early roasters for the markets. They must furnish the eggs for hatching the following season's crop of ducks.

Mr. Rankin holds the distinction of being the first, or one of the first, to make a success of the market duck business by hatching his stock in incubators which he himself constructed before the days of the incubator proper.

The best breeders have found that it does not pay to feed or pamper weaklings. They have found that the ducks do much better when they are allowed a good run and fed out of doors at all seasons. This has reference to stock ducks, for the youngsters have no time to get hardy. Running water is one of the real essentials for Pekins, where they are kept for practical purposes.

Feed for Young Ducks.

One of the best methods of feeding young ducks for about a week is as follows: One measure of corn meal, one of middlings, one of good wheat bran; mix with sweet milk or water, with grit added. Do not have it sticky, but nice and crumbly. Second week—One and one-half measures of corn meal, one measure of middlings, one of wheat bran, one-eighth measure of beef scrape, one measure of roasted bread and one half measure of green rye or clover. Third week—Two measures of corn meal, one-half of bran, one-sixth of beef scrap, one-half of the green clover or rye.

Fourth week—Two measures of corn meal, one and one-half of bran, one-half of middlings, one-half of the beef scrap, one-half of the green stuff. Fifth week—The same, with three-fourths measure of the beef and two of the greens. Sixth week—The same. Seventh week—Three measures of corn meal, one and one-fourth of bran, one-half measure of middlings, one of beef scrap and two of green cut clover or rye. Eighth week (if finishing for the market)—Leave out the bran and add the amount in corn meal and middlings, which will tend to brighten the carcass.

During the last week of feeding avoid anything that may taint the flesh, such as onions or too much rye. Where the ducks are to be kept for layers and not forced for the market it is best to leave out the increase of corn meal and feed as for the fourth week right on to maturity, except a feed of mixed grain once a day, preferably at night.

While this feed is used largely for the development of the Pekin for the broiler market, it is all right for any kind of duck raising.

Indian Runners Disappointing.

During the last ten years the country has gone wild on the Indian Runner. It is best for laying. But many persons have been disappointed with their results, not being able to keep the Runners up in health and strength during a siege of this heavy laying.

We believe this is due more to the vitality of certain families which have been bred for character of feathering rather than for vitality and productiveness. We think that with the same care bestowed upon them as has been given the Pekin for real strength and health that they would do much better in holding up to the work of heavy laying.

These ducks were brought into England over 50 years ago in rather a crude state as to markings, though of a decided Runner type. They came from India. They are of very early maturity, and, as we have said, when well handled, are remarkable layers of much more delicately flavored eggs than the larger members of the duck family. A white egg is claimed for them, although many lay greenish-tinted eggs.

Type of Runners.

Our American Standard gives the Indian Runner as of a fawn-and-white color. There are many who contend the true Runner should be a white with a coarse penciling of fawn and white. In real type the Runner is slim and erect in body, with a long, slim neck, and head carried high, with bill straight out.

Being somewhat of the Leghorn type, they are of but little value for the market. For flavor, it is all right, but the producer is not willing to pay as much to produce a four-pound carcass as it does to get six or seven in the Pekin.

After we have considered the practical varieties, we have the more ornamental, such as the Crested White, Muscovey, Call and Blue Swedish. The later is remarkably beautiful in type and coloring. The Gray Call is very much the same as the wild mallard. In fact, they are of such a wild nature that during the migratory seasons they are decidedly restless. They are called the bantams of the duck family.

The duck question for the practical breeder resolves itself into two propositions—if you want eggs, take the Runners; if meat and eggs combined, the Pekin.

IT'S TIME to feed Pratt's Poultry Regulator, it hastens laying maturity, insures quick and complete moult. That means fall and winter eggs which bring the big prices. It acts on the digestive and egg-producing organs. Your money back if it fails. 25c, 50c and $1.00 packages.

RID your houses of murderous blood-sucking mites. Lee's Liquid Lice Killer does the work effectively, easily, at a small cost. Quart 35c, half gallon 60c, one gallon $1.00.

HAPPY, healthy, hustling hens produce the eggs and bring in the money. Health is more than freedom from disease. It means perfect digestion and good circulation. Conkey's Laying Tonic puts and keeps hens in this condition. 25c, 50c and $1.00 packages.

DUST the hens with Lice Powder, a very effective way to get rid of lice. 25c and 50c.

WHEAT is one of the very best feeds for this season of the year; usually it is hard to get real good chicken wheat at a reasonable price. We have just gotten in a shipment of extra good stock, and are offering it at $1.50 per bushel.

FANCY White Clipped Oats, 75c bushel.

THE RED COMB BRAND of chicken feed is always good, but the car that we have just gotten in is the best we have ever had. We would like for every poultry raiser in Atlanta to try this brand; the price is the same that you have been paying for other feed, but the quality is far ahead. Order a bag and convince yourself that it is the best. 100-pound bag $2.25, 50 pounds $1.15, 10 pounds 25c.

FOR the next few days we will sell Lay-or-Bust Mash Feed at $2.50 per 100 pounds.

Medium-Sized Acreage Tracts

ALL of us know the profit that is usually made from acreage. It is almost a conceded fact that if a person owns good acreage, he has a sure profit in it sooner or later. When we think of acreage propositions, we think of lots of land, and naturally lots of money, because the usual acreage transaction involves a great deal of money. The demand for good, close-in acreage for subdivision purposes is increasing every day. A trip to the outskirts of the city in any direction you choose to take will convince you of this fact. We are going to offer a tract of about 100 acres, between Decatur and East Lake, which we have cut up into five, ten and fifteen acre tracts. The price and terms on these tracts make it possible for almost anybody to handle them.

is located in the Northern part of the State, and is one of the most prosperous sections of the South. GADSDEN, its county seat, is growing and developing by leaps and bounds, due to legitimate conditions which warrant such improvements.

Gadsden is situated on that great waterway, the Coosa River, whose freestone waters are as pure as the morning dew. Here we have steel mills, cotton mills, factories and business enterprises of almost every description, giving employment to thousands of men, where the payroll amounts to more than $300,000 per month and where strikes are unknown.

Gadsden is an ideal place for home-building; her citizens enjoy every modern comfort and convenience. High elevation—abundant rainfall—short mild winters and long temperate summers with delightfully cool nights, all go to make this locality the place for men of every calling and occupation to cast their lot and fortune.

This county offers a fine field for both the large and small farmer, as the towns and villages are filled with people who have money to buy what they want to eat, and they always have the best the farmer can produce.

Farmers Will Raise Cattle Scientifically

Nebraskans Pledge to Follow Instructions in Effort to Cut Cost of Living.

LINCOLN, NEBR., July 5.—To do their part in reducing the high cost of living 200 Nebraska farmers have pledged themselves to devote their time, talents and energies to increasing the production of beef cattle and to follow the instructions of the university experiment station, which has for several years made a special study of raising cattle for beef by what it believes to be the best methods.

"The fact that the population of the country is increasing at an average of 20 per cent every ten years, while beef cattle are decreasing 7 per cent, has aroused the nation to a realization that the high cost of living can never be lowered until this state of affairs is mended, and that the farmers are responsible for the work is just as apparent as that the present conditions exist," said Dean Burnett, addressing the farmers.

Subdivision Sales Net Owners $30,000

Although Clairemont Park, a new subdivision at Decatur, has been opened but two weeks, $30,000 worth of lots has been sold by the L. P. Bottenfield Real Estate Agency, which is handling the property for W. W. Kirkpatrick. The total of lots in the subdivision is 237.

Clairemont Park consists of 70 acres and is known as the old Ramspeck place. It is within three blocks of Ponce DeLeon Avenue and the DeKalb County courthouse. About $40,000 is being spent on streets, sidewalks, sewers, water and other improvements. Lake Seneca is in the center of it.

The Bottenfield agency reports the sale of eleven lots for an aggregate of $9,500, six of these being in Clairemont Park, three in Woodlawn Park, one in Peachtree Highlands, and one in Oakwood Terrace.

Hugh J. Lynch, of this agency, has bought from the McKenzie Trust Company, 234 East Fourth Street, between Bedford Place and North Jackson Street, a neighborhood that is fast building up with attractive homes. Mr. Lynch's house is a two-story brick veneer and cost $8,750. He will move in Tuesday. The lot is 48 by 133 feet.

Home-Builders Busy In Sumter County

AMERICUS, GA., July 5.—From the record of building permits kept by the municipal government it has been learned that this is the busiest summer ever known in Americus in the construction of homes and other buildings. Contractors here are unable to supply the demands of those who wish construction work done, and a number of builders have postponed giving out their contracts until the contractors are able to devote time to them.

The largest number of buildings which are going up are residences, since the need of these has been felt here keenly for years. The exceptionally large number of residences and apartment houses being built is accounted for by the fact that until the adequate and modern water and sewer systems were enlarged, the construction of homes was very much delayed. Now the builders are making up for lost time by crowding and overworking the contractors.

It is the purpose of those who own real estate and are in position to build houses to construct a sufficient number of attractive homes so that it can not be said of Americus that people were compelled to leave the city on account of their inability to secure homes. The building movement in progress here bids fair to produce results that will make Americus a city where homes are as numerous as the demand for them is strong.

Albany Woman Busy Working 40 Plows

AMERICUS, GA., July 5.—There is no better farmer in Sumter County than Mrs. Mary Clay, who has direct supervision of her estate near Americus, where, on a plantation that includes several thousand acres, she supervises the work thoroughly and would not give it up, though she has a splendid home in Americus in addition to the old colonial residence on her country estate.

Mrs. Clay has two agents directly in charge of the work on her plantation, but she is always in touch with the work. There is hardly a day in the year that she does not visit her estate from her residence here, and on these trips she gives directions for the management of the farm work, sometimes spending several days at her country home, which is fitted with every modern convenience and as comfortable as her home in the city.

Since the death of her husband, Cliff Clay, who was widely known throughout this section, Mrs. Clay has had charge of the supervision of her farm, having performed these duties now for many years most successfully and profitably. She very much prefers managing her own estate to leaving it for someone else, and she has no idea now of disposing of it.

Cotton Seed Meal a Southern Asset Poorly Appreciated by Southern Farmer

Affords One of the South's Greatest Advantages in Livestock Raising. Is Rich in Plant Food Content and Lends Itself Admirably to Soil Fertility.

CHARLES A. WHITTLE.

Georgia State College of Agriculture.

It is time for an ode to the golden meal similar to Timrod's to the cotton boll. Lurking in the heart of the fuzzy little seed are wonders incredible. Presto! They troop upon the stage at command of the genius of invention. Now, it is a dainty, elusive and rare perfume; now it is a shimmering liquid that parades as olive oil and defies the epicure to say it is not; now it is enthroned in snowy whiteness in the frying pan; now it is the Jersey's golden butter—but this isn't the ode. This is intended to be a very practical discussion, entitled "How the South turns its cotton seed over to others to go to the trouble of extracting some several millions therefrom, and how the Southern farmer could tap the golden stream without a worry."

The South gets about $16,000,000 for its crop of cotton seed, but if it got what the ultimate consumer pays for it in its various manufactured forms it would get a hundred million dollars. The South does not know all of the tricks of cotton seed transformation. The painstaking, delving, plodding German has unearthed several cotton seed gold mines which he has securely staked. Here the production of swineless lard and a few other edibles more or less known to the public has kept the cotton seed from expatriating the greater part of its resources.

Where the Farmer Comes In.

But to the farmer who grows the cotton, that produces the seed, that the mill grinds and the wonder workers transform, it is up to him to get his fertilizer from it and something more.

A ton of cotton seed contains 58.8 pounds of nitrogen, 21 pounds of phosphoric acid, 31.6 pounds of potash. Convert the seed into meal and a ton of meal will have more than twice as much nitrogen as a ton of seed, nearly three times as much phosphoric acid and considerably more potash.

From 40 to 50 gallons of oil can be obtained from a ton of cotton seed. The oil is not needed for feed or fertilizer. It is, therefore, a product that should go on to the manufacturer to be produced into various forms for the benefit of mankind. The farmer should look to the residue of the seed after the oil has been extracted as a further source of revenue.

A ton of cotton seed meal has plant food constituents or fertilizer values worth $24.26 per ton. The question is, How shall this meal be applied with greatest benefit to the farmer? Shall he apply it direct as a fertilizer or shall he feed it to live stock and apply the manure as fertilizer?

Feed it.

That cotton seed meal takes the place of corn in an animal's ration and can be bought in the South and be fed in the corn belt of the West cheaper than corn has been demonstrated by many years of practice. If cotton seed meal can be shipped to the West and North and fed successfully, what ought the South not gain by feeding it at home?

But—it is a shame to say it—the Southern farmer is not feeding the cotton seed meal, but he is selling it to the Western farmer and is buying from the Western farmer corn to feed. Penny wise and pound foolish! It is not to be explained upon any other basis than that the Southern farmer has not learned how to feed the meal, generally speaking, of course. There are farmers feeding meal in the South, but few, comparatively speaking.

Nothing stands in the way of feeding cotton seed meal in the South. Nothing in the climate forbids it. The food requirements of live stock do not forbid it. In fact, whenever cotton seed meal has been properly fed in the South it has always been with success.

Helps to Make Stock Profitable.

The unbeliever might query: "What is the use of feeding cotton seed meal in the South if cattle can not be raised in competition with the West?"

Cattle can be raised in the South in competition with the West, but, of course, cotton seed meal alone will not account for it. Without the silo, without making use of the long grazing season, without using the double cropping possibilities of a long growing season, and without making the best use of cheap cotton seed meal, there is no use to try to compete with the West in beef production. By making use of the advantages offered, however, nothing whatever can put the South in second place.

In dairying, where the profits are larger than in the growing of beef, these advantages count for even more in the South than elsewhere.

The live stock to which to feed cotton seed meal and the willingness of the farmer to feed cotton seed meal are, of course, two very important essentials. One can not raise cotton alone and make a success of growing live stock on the side by buying the feed supplies. The Southern farmer must raise corn, wheat, oats, peas, clover, cotton, fill a silo and have Bermuda pasture, if he is going to grow live stock successfully.

Indeed agricultural progress in the South awaits diversified farming. Cattle can not be raised without growing the feed crops. The feed crops can not be used to best advantage without cattle on the place. Permanent upbuilding of the fertility of soil can not be accomplished without cattle, diversity of crops and crop rotation. That is the circuit which agricultural prosperity travels. Thus it will be seen that cotton seed meal has an important role to play in the progress of Southern farming.

How It Affords Cheap Food Supply.

In feeding cattle four things are of importance to the farmer: Dry matter, digestible protein, digestible carbohydrates and digestible fat. Dry matter is cheap enough and easy enough to get in the form of a variety of "roughness." Protein is different. It is the most expensive but very essential, going chiefly to building up nerves and tissues. In this element cotton seed meal stands far ahead of other feeds ordinarily used in this country. Carbohydrates build the fires, as it were, under the boiler in heating up the animal and supplying it with energy. They are abundant in most forms of feed raised on the farm. Being easy to get and abundant, carbohydrates are, therefore, comparatively inexpensive.

Fat is another one of the expensive food elements and also very important for building body fat. It can also take the place of carbohydrates as a source of energy and heat. Here again cotton seed meal comes to the fore. It excels in fat contents.

In three particulars cotton seed meal excels—dry matter, protein and fats, when compared to corn, corn bran, wheat bran, wheat middlings, rice bran and oats. The rank of cotton seed meal with some of the leading concentrates is given in the following table:

Name.	Dry Matter, Lbs.	Digestible Protein, Lbs.	Carbohydrates, Lbs.	Fat, Lbs.
Corn	89.1	7.9	66.7	4.3
Corn and cob meal	84.9	4.4	60.7	2.0
Corn bran	90.9	7.4	59.8	4.6
Wheat bran	88.1	12.2	39.2	2.7
Wheat middlings	87.9	12.8	53.0	3.4
Rice bran	90.3	5.3	45.1	7.0
Oats	89.0	9.2	47.3	4.2
Cotton-seed meal	91.8	37.2	16.9	12.2

The table speaks for itself. There is nothing in the class with cotton-seed meal for protein and fats. In no form can these comparatively expensive food constituents be purchased so cheaply as in the form of cotton-seed meal.

Value as Fertilizer When Fed.

Having determined the unquestioned value of the good contents of cotton-seed meal, how about its value as fertilizer when fed to animals? Here it is: A ton of cotton-seed meal contains 135.8 pounds of nitrogen, 57.6 pounds of phosphoric acid and 17.4 pounds of potash. Here again cotton-seed meal shines as compared with corn, corn bran, wheat bran, wheat middlings, rice bran and oats. None of them are in the class with cotton-seed meal in nitrogen, the most expensive of all plant food. The following table will show the relative standing:

Name.	Nitrogen.	Phos. Acid.	Potash.
Corn	26.4	14.0	8.0
Corn and cob meal	28.2	11.4	9.4
Corn bran	32.6	24.2	13.6
Wheat bran	52.4	57.8	32.2
Wheat middlings	52.6	19.0	12.6
Rice bran	14.2	5.8	4.8
Oats	41.2	16.4	12.4
Cotton-seed meal	135.8	57.6	17.4

From this it can be readily seen that the droppings of cattle fed on cotton seed meal will afford the most economic source of nitrogen when compared with other foods. Since about 75 per cent of nitrogen consumed by live stock in the form of food may be returned to the soil in the form of manure, it will be observed how inexpensively cotton seed meal can be made to put nitrogen in the soil.

Incidentally it may here be observed that 25 per cent of the nitrogen plant food in the cotton seed meal can be used to fatten an animal and the balance returned to the soil whence it came, to feed other plants. Is it not better to use the 25 per cent in feeding live stock than in returning it directly to the soil in the form of meal fertilizer?

The 25 per cent of nitrogen of the total content of the food, when fed to animals, gives ample return, but probably in no way more than in milk production. Always where Southern dairymen have used cotton seed meal better returns were receivd. In feeding beef cattle, cotton seed meal and silage are by all odds the cheapest combination of a ration.

In What Quantities to Feed.

The average ration fed to work animals in the South is 14 pounds of corn and 12 pounds of mixed hay per day per 1,000 live weight. It is deficient in protein. Add two pounds of cotton seed meal to the ration and we have nearly the correct standard. It will not hurt the mule or horse. It simply affords him what he needs and his system craves. Mix 900 pounds of corn, 750 pounds of oats and 300 pounds of cotton seed meal and 300 pounds of wheat bran and feed about 15 pounds per day per 1,000 live weight of horse or mule doing hard work, and good results will follow. The 15 pounds, of course, should be divided into three parts and fed morning, noon and night along with mixed hay or stover.

Another convenient combination is 1,500 pounds corn and cob meal and 300 pounds of cotton seed meal, to be fed, of course, three times a day, a total of 15 pounds per day, and along with it roughness.

A mixture of nine parts corn and one part cotton seed meal has been fed to hogs to advantage at the Alabama station, reducing the cost of gain per hundredweight from $7 or $10 per day to $5 or $6. Its value in feeding to dairy cattle has been mentioned. From four to five pounds per 1,000 pounds live weight when a cow is giving two gallons of milk per day is recommended to be fed with ordinary roughness. For beef production from 3 to 6 pounds of cotton seed meal can be fed, depending upon the size of the animal, along with silage and roughness.

Important to South to Boost Meal.

It is curious with all that has been demonstrated of the feeling advantage of cotton seed meal, the case which has often been made in its favor in dairying and beef production, the fertilizing value too clearly made known to leave doubt, that there should be those essaying to be agricultural leaders who, on every occasion choose to speaksoftly in advocacy of this vital resource of the South—cotton seed meal. There are not many. They do not openly oppose. They dare not in the face of a world of facts. Their purposes are concealed and doubtless few are deceived. It is unfortunate, however, when there is so much to be done to educate the Southern farmer to the vast benefits to be derived by the largest possible use of cotton seed, that there should be any one standing around with fingers crossed and "allowing" that it is a good thing for the cotton seed crushers. Of course, it is a good thing for the cotton seed crushers. Why should these progressive Southern men not have a good thing if there are any coming along? Why should not everybody wish not only that the cotton seed crushers should get something out of cotton seed meal but that the Southern farmer should also get something good out of it? What excuse is there for anybody living in the South not boosting the uses of cotton seed meal for every cent that the South can get out of it? Is anybody else more entitled to it?

The feeding of cotton seed meal in the South does not have to be boosted in order to provide a market for cotton seed meal. Germany, Sweeden, Norway, Denmark, Holland, England, France and practically the whole civilized world is buying cotton seed products for feeding purposes. The North is a large consumer. The cotton seed crusher can get along without the South, but the South will be foolish to try to get along without getting every cent it can out of cotton seed meal as a feed for animals.

Peanut Shortage Coming; Chance for Georgia Farms

High Prices Now Paid for "Goobers" May Make Them Good Money Crop.

Although peanut raising has advanced greatly in recent years, the demand for peanuts has increased even faster, and dealers say that there is danger of a complete exhaustion of the present supply before this year's crop is harvested. In other years, when the domestic crop has been short, peanuts have been imported from Spain. Recent cable advices, however, have been to the effect that Spain has no peanuts to export this year.

Spanish peanuts now sell at wholesale for 10 1-4 cents a pound, and Virginia peanuts at 7 cents a pound. These are higher prices than have ever been known before. Last fall Spanish peanuts went above 6 1-4 cents, and other varieties above 5 1-2 cents, these figures causing New York operators to assert that the prices were too high, and that a sharp decline was bound to follow. Another year's showing of the vast increase in the consumption of peanuts in this country, however, has made it apparent that the peanut is destined to become one of the great staples of the country.

Leading dealers have recently been exploring areas adapted to peanut culture, and urging farmers to set out peanut crops. The probability of an overproduction at any time appears to be very small.

The nuts can be raised successfully in parts of New Jersey, and farmers there are taking a lively interest in the subject.

The peanut is easily cultivated, and singularly free from disease and insect pests. There are production records of 200 bushels an acre of the Spanish variety, while the general output from Virginia averages from 70 to 90 bushels an acre. The Virginia peanut is the better of the two.

Georgia farmers very probably would find profit in raising peanuts for market, in the opinion of the State Commissioner of Agriculture.

The last census report showed Georgia's crop for a year as 2,569,787 bushels, raised on 160,317 acres. Brooks County led, with an estimated 365,395 bushels. Thomas, Decatur, Grady, Colquitt and Berrien Counties also planted extensively in peanuts.

These peanuts are not grown for market, but for fattening hogs. The hogs are allowed to root in the fields for the nuts, after the vines have been cut off for the valuable hay.

The estimated average yield is 25 bushels an acre, 25 pounds to the bushel. At a price of 6 cents a pound, a farmer could get $37.50 per acre for the nuts, besides raising a good crop of hay.

In Louisiana and Mississippi, where the boll weevil has discouraged the planting of cotton, the farmers are turning to peanuts, and with considerable success.

25 DAYS MORE IN CONTEST

PONY COMBAT REACHES HOTTEST STAGE AS BONUS CLUB OFFER IS CLOSED

Candidates Work Until Last Hour to Take Advantage of Proposition. Close Race Gives Every Youngster Entered Chance for a Shetland.

It is a weary office force in the contest department of The Georgian and Sunday American.

Until midnight Saturday, the manager and his assistants toiled, receiving votes for the many boys and girls who made strenuous effort to take full advantage of the bonus offer which closed as Sunday was ushered in.

Generous offers of extra votes were made for clubs of five subscriptions, either yearly, half-yearly or quarterly, and either for the daily alone, the Sunday paper alone, or both in combination.

The contest manager gave his personal guarantee that no offer as generous would be made from then on to the end of the contest. Naturally, there was every inducement for the contestants to work their hardest. The result was gratifying, both to the contestants and to the newspapers.

Hundreds of Subscriptions Come.

Literally hundreds of subscriptions were turned in. Now comes the work of tabulating them, and grouping each contestant's returns into clubs of five. This will take several days of hard work, while the regular routine of the office must proceed uninterrupted. Possibly it may be next Sunday before the bonuses will be fully credited. But credited they will be, and accurately.

Nearly all the contestants took a "day off" July 4, and were the guests of The Georgian and American at Grant Park. At 10 o'clock Friday morning the parade left the offices of the newspapers in Alabama Street. There were nine of the 22 ponies in line, all gaily bedecked with flags. The contestants drove them, and it is safe to say that every boy and girl who handled the reins made a firmer resolve to earn permanent possession of one of the ponies as a result of this treat.

The ponies looked their best and were the subject of admiring comment all along the route.

"I know something about horses and ponies," remarked Darwin G. Jones, manager of the Atlanta Clearing House, who made a special trip to see the parade. "I want to remark that it would be impossible to find nine others as good in all Atlanta. They're fine little animals, among the best I ever saw."

More Special Inducements.

While the great bonus offer for clubs of five subscriptions has been withdrawn, it is probable that there will be early announcement of other special inducements to contestants.

With the end of the contest 25 days away, no one is to be allowed to loaf. The pace from now on will be the hottest yet made. From five to ten contestants in every district are running within a few votes of each other. And even the hindmost still has a chance to pass the leaders. It is anyone's race as yet in every district.

Perhaps never before was there as close a contest in Atlanta newspaperdom, which is natural, since certainly never before were as valuable prizes given.

Any boy or girl who wins one of the ponies The Georgian and American are giving away may well be proud of the acquisition. And anyone who assists the contestants by subscribing to The Georgian or American will be satisfied at getting the full value of his money.

I nominate, as a candidate in The Hearst's Sunday American and Atlanta Georgian Pony Outfit Contest:

Credulity and Delay Dangers That Front Pony Contestants

Remember, there is not a contestant in any district who can not be passed —no one has a lien on a pony as yet.

All the world loves a lover—also a winner. Get out in front and your friends will be much more inclined to help you.

It is not the coupon clipper, but the subscription hustler who will get the pony in your district.

One six-months' subscription is worth more than two three-months' subscriptions, and a yearly subscription is worth more than two six-months' subscriptions. Direct your energies accordingly.

It takes work to win—we couldn't give prizes worth while for nothing.

There are two slippery places for the boys and girls who are striving for The Georgian and The American ponies. One of them is delay. The other is credulity. The most dangerous is delay, for while the contestant delays his rival is busy.

Credulity is almost as bad. It cripples boys and girls like paralysis. If the contestant believes all he hears of the marvelous gains made by other candidates it will take the spirit out of him, and he will not be worth half as much as before.

Another danger is "taking a day off." There is not a day to lose! The big bonus offer closes July 5, and the contest itself will be over July 31. July 31 is not so far away.

There will be no sympathy for the boys and girls who might have won, but who "took it easy" after they thought they were "safe."

No one is safe.

The winner in any district is likely to come from the rear ranks.

Keeping everlastingly at it brings success.

SOUTH GEORGIA TO ASK SCHOOL FOR 150 DEAF

Legislature Will Be Asked for Appropriation to Establish Branch of Cave Spring Institution.

TIFTON, July 5.—The urgent need for a school for the deaf in South Georgia is demonstrated by the statistics furnished by the State school census, which shows that of 362 deaf children in the State, 199 are in South Georgia. There are approximately 150 deaf children in South Georgia who are not attending school.

According to State Superintendent of Schools M. L. Brittain the statistics furnished by the State school census taken in May are complete except for four counties and twelve local systems, where the enumerations must be made again. In 144 counties there are 202 white and 124 colored deaf children. Of these 102 white and 97 colored are in South Georgia. The counties and local systems not enumerated will add twelve or fifteen more to this number.

Last year the total enrollment at the Cave Spring School was 188. Of this number less than fifty were from South Georgia, leaving approximately 150 deaf children in South Georgia to whom the liberal appropriation for the institute at Cave Spring is practically worthless. It is to remedy this that the Legislature will be asked to pass a bill to establish a branch school in South Georgia.

At a meeting held in Tifton last March an executive committee with R. C. Postell, of Tifton, chairman, was appointed to inquire into the need for a school for the deaf in South Georgia. Chairman Postell has called a meeting of this committee in the Tifton Chamber of Commerce rooms Monday afternoon, July 7, at 4 o'clock. The purpose of the meeting is to frame a bill providing for the establishment of such a school and to arrange for its introduction.

Jumps Ministry to Try Law in Atlanta

Rev. Dent Atkinson Also Leaves Republican Party to Follow Thomas Jefferson.

GRIFFIN, July 5.—The Rev. Dr. Dent Atkinson, connected with the Chautauqua here, made an unusual leap when in one breath he withdrew from the Presbyterian ministry, from the Republican party, from educational work, and decided to enter the profession of law, enter the Democratic party, be received into the Georgia bar, and locate in Atlanta.

For 20 years Dr. Atkinson has been a minister of the most orthodox type in the Presbyterian denomination, and has held some important pulpits. He has taken a three years' course in law at the Ohio Northern University, as well as taking a degree at Harvard. He is an Englishman by birth, but has spent the greater part of his life in America.

While here Dr. Atkinson appeared before Judge R. T. Daniel, of the Flint Circuit, and was admitted to the bar of Georgia. In September Dr. Atkinson will begin the practice of law in Atlanta.

Student From India At Summer School

ATHENS, July 5.—The attendance at the University Summer School is the largest in the history of the sessions, more than 250 Georgia teachers being registered for the courses.

The chautauqua features, arranged by Dean Woofter, are proving to be very interesting and add a feature that has characterized other popular summer schools the country over. Dean Southwick, of the Emerson School of Oratory, Boston, finished his lectures this week. He will be followed by a series of musical attractions.

Among those attending the summer school is a student from far away India, who is here to study the cotton industry under Professor R. J. H. DeLoach, the newly elected head of the Georgia Experiment Station. He is H. H. Pandya. He will take a general course before returning to his native land.

Pastor May Shed Coat in the Pulpit

Urges Flock to Come Hatless and Coatless for Comfort, and May Emphasize Invitation.

SAVANNAH, July 5.—Men in their shirt sleeves and women without hats will be seen at the Second Christian Church to-morrow. An invitation has been extended by Pastor White to both the men and women of his congregation to make themselves as comfortable as possible. It is possible the pastor will shed his coat, too.

Pastor White holds that to make people attend church in hot clothes will not increase their interest in religion.

HEAT PROSTRATES ROME PASTOR AT GETTYSBURG

ROME, July 5.—Word from Gettysburg to-day announced that Dr. R. B. Headden, pastor emeritus of the First Baptist Church here, is seriously ill. Dr. Headden and M. W. Brett were the only Romans to attend the reunion. So terrific was the heat on the great battlefield that the former was prostrated.

SHIP CITY OF ATLANTA UNDERGOES REJUVENATION

SAVANNAH, July 5.—With fourteen new rooms added on the promenade deck and many other improvements the steamship City of Atlanta of the Ocean Steamship Company has been made as luxurious in every respect as the other vessels of the fleet. The company now has four ships of about the same capacity and comforts in its Savannah-New York service.

Enters Fated Office In Spite of Warnings

Dalton Man Decides to Study Law In Trail of Four Predecessors Who Met Disaster.

DALTON, July 5.—Undismayed by predictions of dire disaster, A. L. Henson, a young insurance agent of this city, has entered the office of Judge Glenn to take up the study of law. Before accepting him into his office, Judge Glenn insisted on giving him a true history of what befell the four other men who studied law under him.

"The first one ran off with another man's wife," said Judge Glenn; "the second went to the penitentiary; the third dropped dead, and the fourth was struck by lightning and made a cripple for life."

All of which is true, and Judge Glenn gave a list of the names of the four men who have studied law in his office.

Savannah Will Bid Stovall Godspeed

Entertainment on Eve of Minister's Sailing for Switzerland Being Planned.

SAVANNAH, July 5.—The friends of Colonel Pleasant A. Stovall are planning an entertainment in his honor before he sails for Switzerland on July 29 as Minister to that republic. Colonel Stovall has been in Washington all week receiving his instructions and studying the relations between the two countries.

HAVANA BUSINESS MAN, NATIVE GEORGIAN, DEAD

John T. Boifeuillet Being Groomed for Race for Congress

Clerk of House of Representatives Mentioned in Fight for Seat of Representative Bartlett.

MACON, July 5.—There is a strong probability that John T. Boifueillet, Clerk of the House of Representatives and private secretary to Senator Bacon, will be a candidate for Congress from the Sixth District next year.

Mr. Boifeuillet is not only very popular in Macon, but is well known throughout the entire district, and is also closely affiliated with the political powers-that-be in this city.

J. Walter Wise, of Fayetteville, and John Randolph Cooper, of Macon, have already announced their candidacies. Congressman Bartlett stated last year that he would not be a candidate again.

Macon Bar Endorses Measure to Abolish Magistrate's Courts

Asociation Will Support Bill To Be Introduced Next Week to Crush Justices of Peace.

MACON, July 5.—The bill to be introduced in the Legislature next week providing for the abolition of all justice of the peace courts within the city limits of Macon was indorsed today by the Macon Bar Association.

Indorsement of the bill was given this week by all of the labor unions of Macon.

The justice courts outside of the city limits will not be affected, but all within the city will be abolished beginning January 1, 1914. The judge of the new court, which shall be known as the "Municipal Court," will receive a salary of $3,000 per year, the clerk $1,500 per year, and the sheriff $1,500 per year, both clerk and sheriff and as many deputies as necessary to be appointed by the judge. The judge will be elected this year in the municipal election, his term to be for four years.

Girl of 15 Elopes to Wed Boy Named Pool

Miss Emma Gilbert Eludes Parents at Dalton and Drives to Spring Place.

DALTON, July 5.—Hundreds of people on Hamilton Street yesterday afternoon witnessed the beginning of an unusually romantic elopement which culminated at Spring Place, Murray County, to-day.

While the parents of Miss Emma Gilbert, aged 15 years, were at the depot awaiting a train to get her out of the way of Love Pool, the young people being bent on marriage, Pool had a friend to drive up. As the parents boarded the train the girl made a dash for the buggy. The friends drove her to where Pool was waiting. Then the question of a marriage license interfered, for Judge Wood, Ordinary, acting on previous instructions from the father, refused to issue it.

Not to be balked after getting an auspicious start, Pool secured a buggy at a livery stable here to-day and with his bride-to-be drove to Spring Place for the marriage license and wedding ceremony.

Nightmare No Crime, Police Judge Rules

Releases Man Arrested as Disorderly Who Proves He Was Only Dreaming.

SAVANNAH, July 5.—Police Court Judge John Schwarz has been called upon to define the difference between a nightmare and a plain drunk. The case was that of J. W. McMillan, a visitor, arrested at the Union Station charged with raising a disturbance and being drunk.

The defendant made the plea that he was not intoxicated, but took a few drinks and fell asleep at the station while waiting for his train, and that during his sleep he had a nightmare. The judge decided a nightmare was no offense and the case was dismissed.

Many Grandmothers To Spoil Baby Girl

Three Great-Great, Three Great and Two Grandmothers Fall to Her Lot.

ELBERTON, July 5.—Frances Elizabeth, the nine-month-old daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Henry Bell, bids fair to become a muchly spoiled child, if grandmothers have anything to do with spoiling children.

Frances has three great-great-grandmothers, three great-grandmothers and two grandmothers, making eight in all. They are Mrs. Elizabeth Dye, 92 years old; Mrs. Martha Smith, 83; Mrs. Mary Butler, 76; Mrs. Mary E. Hammond, 69; Mrs. Corrie Dye, 58; Mrs. Jennie Scott, 55; Mrs. Georgia Bell, 47, and Mrs. Hubert Ware, 36.

ADOPTS CHILD OFFERED FOR SALE BY ITS FATHER

GAINESVILLE, July 5.—Offering a child which he claimed as his son for sale, a man giving his name as John Henry Smith, a few days ago appeared in Gainesville. He tried several of the employees of the Gainesville Cotton Mills, requesting that they buy the little boy, and give him enough money to pay railroad fare to a point in South Carolina.

A Mr. Maxwell, who lives at No. 10 Dean Street, Gainesville Cotton Mill settlement, finally took the child, said he would adopt it, and supplied the man Smith with transportation money.

COURT PERMITS FATHER TO GIVE KIDDIES OUTING

SAVANNAH, July 5.—Under the terms of an order signed by Judge Walter G. Charlton, in the Chatham County Superior Court, Benjamin A Sease may take his children out of the city to Tybee and other resorts, provided he does not leave Chatham County with them.

At the hearing of the Sease alimony case recently the court gave the custody of the children to the mother, Kitty B. Sease, but held that the father might see them at times.

ASK EXTENSION OF STATE ROAD VIA WAYCROSS

Several Counties Organizing to Push Senator Sweat's Scheme for Lengthening Line.

WAYCROSS, July 5.—Several counties are discussing the organization of an association for the purpose of promoting the suggested route for the State railroad extension via Fort Valley and Waycross to St. Marys and Jacksonville.

Right of way through nearly all counties named by Judge Sweat in his resolution before the Georgia Senate will be given to the State, and some counties have gone further and agreed to use their convicts in building the roadbed. This, it is argued, will materially reduce the cost.

Waycross for a number of years has hoped for the extension. Because of the low cost of constructing a road along what is known as the ridge route of Georgia, which would bring the road via Waycross, the territory traversed is among that in the State undergoing most rapid development. The State owns vast terminals already at St. Marys, and this is a fact that it is thought will have much weight with the commission if Governor Slaton appoints one.

Augusta Pastors to Urge Prison Reform

Special Sermons To Be Preached by Leading Ministers for This Cause.

AUGUSTA, July 5.—A number of Augusta pastors have set aside tomorrow to preach on the wretched condition of the prisons of Georgia and the prisoners within their walls. In response to a letter from the Atlanta Ministers' Conference, making an appeal that the subject be discussed from the pulpits to-morrow, several ministers have indicated that they will do so.

The movement to better prison conditions started by the Men and Religion Forward Movement is expected to accomplish good results, according to a leading local minister, and Richmond County's Representatives in the General Assembly will be urged to favor any bill that tends to improve conditions in Georgia prisons and among Georgia prisoners.

To Lay St. Joseph's Cornerstone Sunday

Bishop Kelley to Officiate at Catholic Academy Ceremony In Augusta.

AUGUSTA, July 5.—A large number of Augustans will attend the cornerstone laying at the Mount St. Joseph Academy on Monte Sano Sunday afternoon. Rapid progress is being made on the building, and the Atlanta concern which has the contract is endeavoring to get the building completed ahead of contract time.

The laying of the cornerstone will be a very impressive ceremony. The Right Rev. Benjamin J. Kelley, bishop of the diocese of Savannah, will bless the cornerstone and deliver the principal address. Mount St. Joseph was brought to Augusta from Washington, Ga., after fire destroyed the school last winter. It is being rebuilt here on a much larger scale.

Athens To Be Host To State Assembly

Legislators Visit Classic City Next Saturday to Inspect Three State Colleges.

ATHENS, July 5.—Next Saturday, July 12, will be lawmakers' day in Athens, and the entire Georgia Legislature and Senate will invade the "Classic City." The Athens Chamber of Commerce has invited the joint house to visit the city and make a thorough survey of the State's property here, including the University of Georgia, State College of Agriculture and State Normal School.

The House and Senate have accepted the invitation and the city is making preparations for a lively time. A barbecue will be served that will make the solons forget even the one served by Macon in trying to entice them to move the capital to the Central City.

Strict Segregation Savannah's Solution

Police Judge Declares No Resorts Will Be Permitted Outside of District Lines.

SAVANNAH, GA., July 5.—That houses of questionable character will not be tolerated outside the segregated district has been made clear by Recorder John Schwartz. Houses where rooms are rented without question will be kept under surveillance and when necessary raids will be made. The Recorder will back the police in every move made against houses that are operated outside the district.

JEWETT WILLIAMS GIVEN A CHAIR AT SEWANEE

MACON, July 5.—The Rev. H. L. Jewett Williams, son of Dr. Howard Williams, has been offered the chair of Greek in Sewanee University, and it is expected that he will accept. He is now rector of the Episcopal Church at Milledgeville. Rev. Mr. Williams graduated from the University of Georgia and from Sewanee, and also had a Rhodes scholarship at Oxford, England. He is only 23 years old.

GAINESVILLE IS PLANNING COMMISSION GOVERNMENT

'INDEPENDENCE DAY' NEAR FOR BUSINESS AND FINANCE, SAYS FORBES

Best Securities Are on Bargain Basis—Bank Statement Shows Healthy Contraction of Loans—Crop Outlook Is Good—Proposed Tax on Cotton Futures Is Vicious Measure.

By B. C. FORBES.

NEW YORK, July 5.—The United States should, within the next few months, enter an era of unexampled prosperity.

Commercial house-cleaning, however, is not over. A good deal of debris remains to be thrown out.

Finance, on the other hand, has apparently finished its process of expurgation. Recovery in securities now is due. The probabilities are that there will not be a fresh wave of liquidation, carrying prices much lower, but of course no human being can forecast the ups and downs of stocks.

It can be said very definitely that the best securities are now on a bargain pasis; that, be measured by all the recognized yardsticks, prices are not too high and that sooner or later present buyers will reap substantial profits in addition to the generous income they will draw on every dividend or interest date.

Developments of vital moment have come since last Sunday. Nearly all have been favorable, or, where not pleasant, exactly in line with expectations—as for example, the discharge of thousands of employees in woolen and other industries affected temporarily by coming tariff changes.

The Bank Statement.

First place I would assign to something that passed unnoticed out of banking circles, namely, the comptroller of the currency's report, giving the condition of the country's 500,000 national banks. Between April 4 and June 4, loans were curtailed $35,000,000, and cash increased fully $125,000,000, demonstrating clearly and encouragingly that the iflation which threatened to culminate in disaster in the autumn has been taken in hand.

New York City was responsible for half the gain in cash and two-thirds of the contraction in loans.

As compared with a year ago, however, national bank loans are up $190,000,000, despite a loss of $31,000,000 cash, indicating that there is still need for caution.

The Government's report on cotton was so gratifying that quotations for the staple at once declined sharply. The condition is far above expectations, and everything points to a good crop. Inasmuch as raw cotton is our most valuable export commodity, this is doubly helpful.

Grain "experts," after their wont, have been shrieking that the growing plants were being scorched by the sun, killed by frost or devoured by insects. But the Government's report does not substantiate these calamity tales.

Big Crops in Sight.

Gross harvests of 1913 can easily reach $10,000,000,000, given normal conditions from now on.

Political developments have not been hurtful to the business world. The astounding revelations of "David Lamar" at Washington have opened the eyes of people to the inner workings of certain anti-capital crusades. The motives behind more than one "investigation" manifestly have not been solely patriotic.

Hereafter the origin of attacks upon this, that and the next corporation will be traced, and it is just possible fewer probes and fewer suits will oe instituted.

The tardy solution of the Union-Southern Pacific divorce problem, although clumsy and not free from complications in the future, has removed a weight from Wall Street's mind.

The vicious proposal to tax dealings in cotton "futures" naturally has aroused a storm of protest, for it would embarrass cotton growers, cotton manufacturers, spinners and everyone associated with the business, to say nothing of driving dealers in the staple from New York and New Orleans to Liverpool, where the advantages of a free, unfettered market are properly appreciated.

The manufacturer who undertakes to make and supply so many gross of shirts or dresses or sheets at a stipulated price, in order to escape the risk, at once arranges to have the raw material delivered to him at a specific price. On the cotton exchanges he can buy this material for future delivery, as there is an active market all the time for "futures." But if every bale thus traded in be taxed $2 or $3, this market will be ruined.

The manufacturer will have to pay more for his protection against uncertain fluctuations and the grower will not find a ready market for his crop.

The cotton tax is barbaric and should be killed before it reaches the statute book. It would benefit nobody, but would injure everybody.

Balkans to Quiet Down.

War again has broken out in the Balkans among the Servians, Bulgarians and Greeks, but although European financial centers were disturbed and British consols declined, the chances are that the trouble will not be protracted. The thirst for blood has been satisfied—and treasuries are about empty.

Our own security markets were extremely dull, as they usually are on the eve of holidays. But the undertone has grown firmer. Sentiment in high places is less pessimistic. The buying looks better than the selling. Of outside liquidation there has been practically none, while odd-lot purchases have been the significant factor.

Most bankers are becoming reconciled to the Owen-Glass currency bill and are co-operating to win amendments rather than senselessly blustering that national charters would be given up in exchange for State ones.

The measure has important merits and certainly will be preferable to the present system, which has fostered centralization of banking power in too few hands.

"Independence Day" in the financial and business world is drawing nearer.

Coal to Cost More Within Next Year, Declare Operators

Export Demand One Factor in Creating New Markets for Product of Southern Mines.

KNOXVILLE, TENN., July 5.—Coal operators in the Kentucky and Tennessee fields, whose output moves largely into Georgia and adjoining States, report that the market is in better condition at this season of the year than ever before. Prices are averaging from 5c to 15c per ton higher than one year ago, with a strong demand for all grades. It is understood that contracts for railroads involving between 1,000,000 and 2,000,000 tons have been made at an advance of 10 cents per ton over the contract price of last year. This quantity of coal will be taken out of commercial channels, and will help advance prices during the next twelve months.

The demand for steam and domestic coal is unusually good for this season of the year, and most operators have sold their entire output up to September 1, and are not anxious to make quotations for shipments of domestic coals after that date, as they believe a strong market will develop in the fall and winter. There has been a slight let-up in the past 30 days for the finer grades of steam coal, and the increased production in domestic has caused 3-inch steam and nut and slack to be more plentiful, so that nut and slack is selling from 5c to 10c less than 30 days ago.

An unusual feature is a car shortage. Operators believe this indicates a serious shortage in the late fall and winter months.

There are several causes why prices on coal going from all fields into Georgia territory will probably be higher during the next twelve months. In the first place, exports of coal during the past ten months have been greater than ever before, especially from West Virginia fields.

This relieves the pressure of coal from that field on the other Southern coal fields. Alabama also is finding new markets at Gulf coast points and for export, which takes away some coal going into the Southeastern States. Alabama is coking considerable coal and this coke is going into Mexican and far West points. Large operators in Kentucky and Tennessee are successfully invading the Central and Northwestern States with domestic coal, which, because of its high quality, successfully competes in those parts with coal from all other fields. This diverts a large tonnage which has been going into Southeastern States.

Carnegie in Favor of New Currency Bill

President Wilson Should Stand Firm if Opposition Develops to His Plans, He Says.

ZERMATT, SWITZERLAND, July 5.—Andrew Carnegie is keenly interested in the fate of the banking reform bill as presented to Congress by President Wilson.

"It is the most important and most necessary legislation on which America has had to decide for years," he says, "the present American currency system is a disgrace to the country. It is not true that bankers and leading business men are opposed to the measure. That is nonsense. The best bankers and business are for the reform. The Aldrich bill is all right and so long as the principle thereof is maintained I do not care about the details.

"If opposition should develop, my advice to President Wilson is to stand firm. When a panic starts other countries and governments possess the power to step in and act. Some speculators fail, it is true, but it is a good thing that they should do so.

Southern Railway Fours Are Sagging

Increased Dividends for Preferred Fail to Cause Rally Because of Underlying Conditions.

NEW YORK, July 5.—General investment conditions have operated against an advance in Southern Railway's development and general mortgage 4 per cent bonds after the preferred stock was put back on its regular 5 per cent basis. Around 74, the bonds are only four points above their lowest level. At present price they yield more than 5.60 per cent.

However, the decline has not been as marked as in the high-grade savings bank issues. These have suffered losses of 5, 6 and 7 points, while the Southern 4s are off only about 4½ points from the high of this year.

The Southern has more mileage with low-earning power than any other important road in its territory. However, its branch mileage is a source of strength, as indicated by the steady increase in gross and net earnings every year since 1909. Development of the South tends to increase the earning power of these branches. As yet little new capital has had to be spent on them.

English Carpets to Invade U. S. Markets

Tariff Situation Closely Watched, and Any Opening Will Be Seized by Britain.

NEW YORK, July 5.—Reports from carpet and rug manufacturers show that their mills are fully occupied in getting out orders which have been placed for the fall season. Reports to the effect that certain mills were closed, or partly closed down, have been promptly denied. The heaviest sales for the season have been on axminster rugs, and some additional orders are still coming from buyers who do not believe that they are sufficiently covered.

The opinion is becoming more general that fall prices were opened too low. Raw material has continued to move upward, and is in very short supply. There are a good many in the trade who believe that the tariff bill will not be passed in time to be of much service for the fall season, in the way of getting wool in free.

According to representatives of carpet houses in this market who have just returned from a visit to the manufacturing centers abroad, there will be keen competition on the part of the British mills for American trade.

THEY ALL KNOW WHAT COTTON GROWERS NEED

Senator Clarke and Steamship Lines Are Busy Regulating the South's Great Industry.

By M. A. ROSE.

Next to corporation-baiting undoubtedly the most popular amusement of the genus reform is regulating the cotton industry.

The Southern farmer is held up to ridicule as the most incompetent of all the tillers of the soil. Even the Egyptian fellaheen can give him pointers, these reformers assure us. Either the American cotton grower plants too much or he plants too little, according to who is talking at the particular moment when you are listening. Then the English spinner takes a whirl at him. He accuses the Georgia darky of deliberately wetting the inside of his bales to make weight. The cotton grower has no business sense, he gives himself into the clutches of the supply merchant, and he sells his product at the bottom resting-place of prices. He is criminally careless in baling and marking. In brief, he does everything wrong.

Yet somehow he makes an honest living, which is more than can be said for some of his most vigorous critics.

Another Good Target.

Disposing of the farmer in this unanswerable style, the critic turns to the dealer in futures. Here is a "bird of prey," a fine target! Congress went so far as to probe an alleged "bull" clique. The bulls were trying to boost cotton prices. Plainly this was a crime. The "bears," who were trying to depress prices, escaped unremarked.

The very latest is the Clarke amendment to the tariff, which would tax cotton futures contracts, entered into under the rules of any cotton exchange.

Cotton men just now are issuing broadsides declaring that this is designed to put every exchange out of business. The elaborate machinery which has been built up for reporting crop conditions, and which makes it possible for Liverpool to learn in five minutes' time the arrival of a tiny bug in a single American county—all will be destroyed.

How Exchanges Help.

Now, every cotton farmer who cares knows within a few minutes what price Liverpool, New York and New Orleans are paying for his crop. Destroy the exchanges and he will be at the mercy of those who can afford to maintain private news service. Furthermore, say the cotton men, instead of destroying speculation, such a bill will have the exactly opposite effect of making the spot business, now stable, extremely hazardous. The buyer will not be able to sell contracts against his purchases of the actual. He will have to shave three or four cents from his price to ward against possible declines.

All this is a lugubrious picture. Perhaps it is overdrawn. It may be that once a tax on cotton futures contracts is made a law the traders will find themselves not so crippled as they now believe. Everyone remembers what prophecies of calamity greeted the first news of a slash in the tariff, and how they have quieted now that reductions are seen to be inevitable and wailing useless.

The fact remains that while no doubt there is a certain amount of manipulation in the cotton rings, still the exchanges fill a very real need. They are necessary. They help the cotton farmer far more than they hurt him. They should not be harassed or hampered.

Clarke Not Alone.

But Senator Clarke, who, like many other strange things, comes from Arkansas, is not the only one "taking a whack" at the cotton industry these days.

The steamship men, whose impossible strictures on the shipment of cotton have been explained in this column, appear to be inexorable.

September 1, without fail, they will put their new rules into effect, they say. Seeing that the deadlock is serious, the Georgia Bankers' Association is sending out an open letter to farmers, ginners, cotton-seed oil mills, cotton exporters and cotton compresses. The letter gives notice that September 1 the steamships will begin to mark through bills of lading with notices of bad condition. The bankers officially give warning that bills so marked will be unnegotiable, and it will be impossible for the exporter or buyer to draw through New York or other centers for the value of the cotton.

Eventually this agitation against careless handling of the crop will work out into good. But the high-handed method of reform attempted by the steamship combine can result in nothing but hardship for several seasons.

And, of course, the farmer will be the "scapegoat."

HOSIERY MOVES WELL.

Hosiery manufacturers who have put their spring (1914) lines on the market do not anticipate great difficulty in selling them up quickly. In several instances the biggest part of the season's production has already been contracted for.

KNITTERS MAY STRIKE.

The unsettled condition of labor in the sweater end of the knit-goods trade is causing the manufacturers some concern. Some of the mills making these goods have already had strikes, and it is said that other outbreaks are not unexpected.

DRESS GOODS DULL.

Business is quiet in the dress goods market at the moment. Buyers refuse to contract ahead until the tariff has been settled definitely. Cancellations are not so heavy as might be expected in view of the unsettled condition of the trade.

ADVENTURERS OF LAMAR TYPE ARE PLENTIFUL

"The Street" Often Outwitted by Men of No Experience and No Capital, From Nowhere.

By BOERSANIER.

CHICAGO, July 5.—"The street" has the reputation of drawing the most astute men in the world of business. It is accounted the essence of astuteness, the keenest form of shrewdness, to succeed there. Men who have qualified for eminence in various lines of industrial activity are supposed to be tested in "the street" for a final degree.

And yet there is the paradox that in no department of trade are brazen and shallow adventurers more successful than in "the street." Blackguards and blackmailers who, should they endeavor to operate in any commercial line, would be detected and banished instanter, flourish unmolested in the purlieus of the stock exchange.

Lamar is only one of a myriad of instances. Lest his position and operations be underestimated, it must be confessed that from time to time he made himself "useful" to powerful men. For a while he was James R. Keene's intimate. He supped with John W. Gates and played many parts for scaly "banking houses" arrayed in opposition to this or that plan.

Some Rocket Careers.

But there are adventitious characters in no way suggestive of the "wolf" type as represented by Lamar; men sincere enough in their way with methods, if not wholly impeccable, at least lawful. The most part of these have no financial antecedents. They come from journalism, from the law, from the medical profession. They arrive in "the street" comparatively unknown, with practically no knowledge, certainly no experience, of financial affairs, and in a few months the country is ablaze with their exploits. How they do it is a mystery.

England has had several "Hooleys"—fellows who positively terrorized bankers and corporation managers into the wildest sort of speculative schemes. At about the same time in Wall Street a certain doctor ran an amazing campaign in a dozen worthless curb stocks; ran these shares to par and over, assisted by a tramp newspaper man who had been unable to earn $20 a week in Chicago, who sold out before the crash came, pocketing nearly $1,000,000 before he hurried to Europe.

Two Schemes Survive.

A still higher instance is that of a Chicago attorney who suddenly burst forth as a promoter of a half-dozen companies, two of which have survived and are highly profitable. The gentleman was wholly unknown in LaSalle Street. Nevertheless his undertakings and all oversubscribed—and had it not been for the opposition of the Moores, who were then busy with their steel promotions, the attorney might have merged all the industries of the West and Middle West. This genius subsequently distinguished himself as a novelist and a dramatist. He also is now a wine and art connoisseur. It is needless to note that he began life as a journalist.

The case of "Napoleon" Ives is a further exemplification. Ives had been a subordinate clerk in a broker's office. His duties were to fill the ink wells and to run errands. One day "the street" could not believe its ears when it heard that this junior clerk had captured the Cincinnati, Hamilton and Dayton Railroad—at that time a flourishing property. Ives had somehow, in some way, got out-of-town capitalists to enter a pool he had formed to get control of the road. No Wall Street man had been invited—hence Wall Street's surprise.

Quite as abrupt and romantic was A. A. McLeod's acquisition of the Reading and of the New York and New England roads. McLeod had been a milkman in Minneapolis. He drifted into Wall Street, and had not been there long before he startled everybody, particularly J. P. Morgan, by seizing the management of two important railway companies. Most of these rockets—and many more—came down completely exploded, as suddenly as they had risen. The amazing point is that they should have gone up at all in a thoroughfare inhabited by a nation's most sophisticated citizens.

Wheat Market Due Rise on Crop News

Reports of Losses In South Dakota Give Bulls Strength for Assault In Monday's Trading.

By JOSEPH F. PRITCHARD.

CHICAGO, July 5.—It is expected by the more conservative men in the wheat trade that Monday's reports of crop losses in the spring wheat country will be sensational. In consequence, a bull market in wheat is among the probabilities for Monday. While the export business of the past few weeks was noted with no great amount of enthusiasm by the wheat trade at large, the most ardent bears will be obliged to sit up and take notice in case these reports should continue.

Very little will be heard from the winter wheat country save of the enormous movement which will soon be under way and of larger thrashing returns than were looked for even by the most ardent bear. There are spots in the wheat belt of the Southwest where there have been losses but there will be more than enough of this grain to go around when final returns are made.

There is still a big long interest in corn and oats as shown by the persistent buying on all the dips. There will be a day of reckoning, however, and unless new buying power is to be seen in the market, price recessions are among the probabilities.

Stock Exchange Working Hard to Restore Confidence

Old Secretive Attitude Gives Way to Campaign of Education—Queer Deals Cease.

NEW YORK, July 5.—Nearly a half-year has gone by since the New York Stock Exchange began measures of reform, and it is possible to gain a retrospective view of the results obtained. It may be said that the leaders in the movement are satisfied with what has been accomplished toward improving the general morale of operations in securities, and the groundwork laid for lifting the exchange above public reproach they believe to be secure.

The government committee has, in the first place, made application in recent months of the old adage about an ounce of prevention and a pound of cure. The committee has worked to eliminate incipient evils before they grew large enough to be subjects of general comment in the Street. The infliction of discipline—and there has been much discipline inflicted—has been gone about quietly, with the purpose of curbing infraction of the rules before greater infractions could occur. The effort has met with much success.

In consequence, largely, the exchange is entitled to considerable satisfaction over the fact that while recent sharp declines in the international markets brought in their train a number of failures in London, Paris and Berlin, not a single New York Stock Exchange house got into trouble.

"Manipulation is dead on the exchange," said a prominent member yesterday. "The governors have placed themselves so rigidly in opposition to every possible method of creating a fictitious market for a stock that no one would dare make the attempt. An outside operator might possibly try it, but the odds are greatly against any Stock Exchange house keeping his account if his trading became a matter of suspicion. There is no doubt about that. The committee on business conduct would take care of that end of the problem."

The committee on business conduct is, without doubt, the best adjunct to proper management of the exchange that has been added to the executive power in many years. The committee's function is to enforce proper conduct between members and their clients, to prevent reckless or unbusinesslike transactions on the board room floor, and to throttle manipulation. The scope of its influence is clearly seen in these three items.

The business conduct committee consists of five members, all of whom are members of the governing committee. The members have the power of examining the books of any Stock Exchange house at any time, to summon members of the exchange to explain acts which have been called into question, and to inquire into relations between members and customers.

If a stock begins to act strangely, the committee finds out who is buying and selling it, and the buyer and seller have to explain all about their transactions.

The committee reads carefully market letters sent out by commission houses. If it be decided that the contents are too much on the order of "tips," the house responsible therefor is warned that more matter-of-fact statements must be substituted for prophecies.

The formation of the committee on business conduct was one of the first products of the reform movement. The idea of having a number of responsible members in a position to get closer to the inner workings of the exchange than the larger board of governors was able to do was conceived by a special committee appointed to "consider the matter of handling margin accounts and rehypothecating securities and devise measures which will serve more fully to protect the public."

It is doubtful if the rank and file of Stock Exchange members realized how widespread would be the duties of the new organization. It was dubbed the "police committee" at first, and an impression prevailed in some quarters that the most onerous work of the members would be to prevent horseplay on the floor. Those who allowed this thought to submerge more weighty considerations were quickly disabused of it.

Another direction taken by Stock Exchange reform which stands out prominent in the history of the past six months is in the way of education. There was a time, not so very long ago, when information about operations on the board was extremely hard to get. The attitude of the authorities seemed to be that the public did not need to know anything about a lot of matters. Such is not the case at the present time.

A committee has been formed which supplies inquirers with answers to all reasonable queries as to stocks, bonds, earnings of companies and methods of business on the exchange. Furthermore, this committee has carried the campaign of education to the public instead of waiting for the public to appear in Wall Street.

Crossties Wanted, Even at High Prices

Savannah Dealers Report Heavy Movement—Woodsmen Pressed to Keep Up to Demand.

SAVANNAH, GA., July 5.—With crossties ranging at the highest price levels of years, Savannah firms report an unusual volume of business. The woodsmen are hard pressed to keep pace with the demand.

One of the best contracts for cypress crossties has been closed with the Government, the ties being destined for use in construction work in the Panama Canal Zone, and the American steamship Jacob Bright reached port Friday morning to load cargo. She will sail early next week with 20,000 ties, which were sold on a basis of 95 cents each.

The railroads of the North and East, which have been experimenting with oak and chestnut crossties, have found them unsuitable and are rapidly returning to pine.

The values now quoted are 58 cents for standard heart ties of pine, while sap ties are ruling at 38 cents. These are the actual prices paid to cutters and contractors.

More than 114,000 ties were shipped out of the port of Savannah during the month of April.

PROPOSED TAX DIVERTS NOTICE FROM MARKET

Cotton Men Too Busy Fighting Clarke Amendment to Notice Closely Daily Fluctuations.

NEW ORLEANS, July 5.—Pending the outcome of the proposed legislation at Washington, which would place a prohibitive tax on contracts for the future delivery of cotton, comparatively little interest is being taken in the cotton market itself. Cotton men, who realize that the system of contract trading in New Orleans and New York is absolutely essential for carrying on the immense forward business in the South's great staple, are more concerned in the fight for the maintenance of contract markets than in temporary fluctuations, which, however, continue to show a steady undertone, with support on all easy periods.

It has been clearly demonstrated by men here who are experts on cotton matters that while all lines of the cotton business will be seriously affected by the enactment of the Clarke amendment into law, the man who will suffer most from such ill-conceived legislation will be the cotton producer himself. In the first place, the wiping out of the contract markets would do away with an army of small spot buyers who are accustomed to hedge against possible losses by selling contracts against their purchases of spot cotton, and thus deprive the farmers of the benefit of competition for their cotton. The logical consequence would be that the control of the spot markets of the South would pass into the hands of a few rich interests, and eventually, it is argued, would lead to the formation of a gigantic cotton trust somewhat on the order of that which now has the cattle raisers of the United States in its grip.

No less an authority than Colonel Henry G. Hester states that if the Clarke amendment is adopted the value of cotton in the South will be lessened two to three cents a pound. Buyers of spot cotton, unable to protect themselves against losses by hedges in the contract market, will necessarily allow a margin for possible fluctuations in the value of the staple by reducing the prices paid to the producer. With the aid of the contract market spot buyers are able to pay full market values for cotton and can always find an outlet for their purchases.

Month of Good Weather Will Assure Big Yield of Cotton

MEMPHIS, July 5.—If there is reasonably good weather in the cotton belt during the next thirty to forty days the foundation will be laid for a crop that should put at rest talk of very high prices during the ensuing fall and winter. At the present time there is ample basis for looking for the second largest crop the South has ever grown, some extremists talk of a possibility of it running the 1911 crop a close race. This, however, is hardly worthy serious talk, for acreage, according to official authorities, is not equal to that season, and condition at the time of the last compilation was several points lower. As conditions during the latter half of the summer of 1911 were rather abnormal in more ways than one and are not likely to be repeated, it is not conservative to expect the yield to reach within a million bales of the record.

There have been rains where needed, supplying the moisture essential to the plant catching up its late start and taking on fruit, yet as a rule they have been local in character and many areas are only partially supplied. Others have not had enough to do more than temporary good, and very soon permanent injury to prospects may result. The high temperatures in the central belt were not ideal, except where showers came and enabled the plant to take on size. Reports reaching here from the Eastern belt have told of improvement, though not by any means uniform.

The handicap to the crop continues to be its lack of size, which, the first week in July, is worthy of serious consideration. The season is at hand for fruiting, and if the plant is not well developed chances are against it becoming heavily fruited. The rains have helped considerably, but there have not been enough of them and there still is the danger of drouth later.

Cultivation has gone ahead under favorable conditions and the crop is perhaps cleaner than ever known, which is a feature of importance as to yield and the quality of the crop. It is difficult to conceive how conditions can arise that will cause the fields to become grassy. The crop will be laid by under the best conditions in years and in many sections earlier than usual, though it will not be an early crop when size and maturity of the plant is considered.

The depredations of the weevil in the infested sections have been checked, for little has been heard during the past week in regard to them. The hot sun and lack of moisture have helped to check the pest, while the vast numbers caught and destroyed have also been a factor. Tow-ever, it is now between seasons with the pest, and the real test as to what it will do comes a little later.

There has been little activity in the spot department, though quotations have held fairly steady. Movement has been moderate. The strength in the summer contracts has extended to the entire market, and is based on continued good consumption and the smallness of stocks for protection of short sales.

YANKEE TRACK STARS TO SHOW IN AUSTRALIA

All-American Team Will Leave for Other Side in November. Schedule Arranged.

WILLIAM UNMARK WILL MANAGE AFFAIR AGAIN

Efforts Are Being Made to Sign Kiviat, Adams, Jones, Craig and Kelly for Trip.

By Thomas J. Halpin.

Quarter-Mile Champion of United States and Canada.

AN all-American track and field team will leave San Francisco for New Zealand and Australia about the middle of November. The trip this year is assured, for all arrangements have been made and the team is under consideration.

The trip of an American team, which was to be composed of Western track stars, did not fall through last year because of the Australians not desiring to finance the trip. On the contrary, the true reason was due to the fact that a numer of the men selected dropped out at the last moment after all arrangements had been completed and berths engaged on a boat sailing for that country.

Eastern Stars to Make Trip.

The Australians have never been able to understand the reason why the trip failed, and despite the efforts of William Unmack, who had charge of the affair and who will manage the trip this year, the sportsmen of New Zealand are yet in the dark as regards the last proposed trip.

The team this year will be selected from athletes in the East and West and it will be more of an all-American outfit. A fine schedule has been arranged which will embrace the cities of Auckland, Wellington, Dunedin, Christchurch and Rotorua in New Zealand, Launceton and Hobart in Tasmania, Sydney, Melbourne, Newcastle and possibly Adelaide and Brisbane in Australia, besides many other country towns. The team will reach San Francisco on the return trip about the middle of April, 1914.

The tour is being arranged by the Pacific Coast Association of the A. A. U., and special permits will be granted the men to compete by the national body. The athletes will enter over a score of meets. Some weeks the men will have to compete in two meets, but at the present time this is all tentative, but a full schedule will be arranged in the course of a month.

To Run on Grass Tracks.

All of the meets will be held on grass tracks, and for this class of tracks the Australians have shown some wonderfully fast performances. The sprinters will be the attraction, for in that country, as in England, the favorite events are the 100 and 120-yard dashes, and many wagers are placed on these races. Cox, of New South Wales, is a very fast sprinter, having been credited with ten seconds many times. In New Zealand, Roland Opie, who has a great reputation even in this country, is coming out again to compete against the American team. He has been in retirement for some time, but should be able to get running in fine shape again. He has been credited with 9 4-5 seconds for the 100, while he has also done 21 4-5 for the 220 on grass.

These tracks are liable to bother the American sprinters, as they have had little experience in running on this sort of a footing. The Australians are, on the other hand, very familiar with these courses, and will have the advantage of competing in their own country.

In past cases where American athletes have visited Australia they have been bothered to a great extent by the hot, dry heat. They have, however, been able to run much faster in the Antipodes than in this country, when they became acclimated.

Up to the present time no definite invitations have been issued, but William Unmack has, however, been corresponding with Kiviat and Platt Adams and several other well-known American athletes. Among these are Jones, Craig and Kelly.

Ty Cobb Now Fears Permanent Injury

Baseball's Greatest Star Badly Spiked Several Days Days Ago.

CLEVELAND, OHIO, July 5.—Tyrus Raymond Cobb, the greatest ball player of this or any other age, is a bench warmer for the Detroit Tigers. Injury has laid him low.

Just how long Ty will be out of the game neither he nor anyone else knows. The Georgia peach is wearing a careworn expression for he fears his injury may be permanent.

Ty's hurt is a bad spike wound on the right knee. His knee is swollen to twice its normal size and he can hardly walk. In the Detroit-Chicago series recently Ty was spiked by Weaver. He stuck in the line-up day after day until the Fourth, simply on his nerve alone.

Cobb went home to Detroit last night when the team left for St. Louis. He will have an X-ray picture taken to find out if the top of the kneecap is cracked.

LEE TANNEHILL TRADED.

MINNEAPOLIS, July 5.—Lee Tannehill, former infielder of the Kansas City club, of the American Association, appeared in the line-up of the Minneapolis team in yesterday's game. Tannehill was purchased by Manager Joe Cantillon, of Minneapolis, from the Kansas City club.

FOUR TO JOIN FEDS.

QUINCY, ILL., July 5.—Outfielder Ward, Infielders Conger and Golvin and Catcher Tom Hackett jumped the Quincy team, of the Three-I League, today. It is reported they have gone to St. Louis to join the Federal League.

KLAUS GOING TO AUSTRALIA.

PITTSBURG, July 5.—Frank Klaus, the Pittsburg candidate for the middle weight title, will be matched for a series of bouts in Australia. It is said that the trip will prevent Klaus from returning to Paris for another bout with Georges Carpentier.

VENERABLE AND VERSATILE MAN IS G. MERRITT

GEORGE HAS BEEN AT IT SINCE THE WAR OF 1812

Broke Into Majors With Pittsburg—Plays Any Position Except Catcher—Hits Hard.

By Al H. Wilson.

GEORGE MERRITT, versatile all-round player for the Memphis ball club, has a past—considerable past, in fact.

All persons who have a past are supposed to be interesting and especially ball players. As a rule they are interesting only during the hot-stove league season, for generally their past is the best thing about them.

But not so with George Reliable Merritt. He's still there with the proverbial bells.

Dating back to the '90's, baseball histories in various leagues in various parts of the country contain records of the doings of Merritt, and when the Southern season closes its 1913 year George is pretty certain to find his name rather prominently mentioned in the annals, especially in the part that refers to Memphis doings.

George has been doing great service all season as utility player, acting as sub for sick and disabled fielders, and incidentally he has been making many pitchers look like milk and mush. It may be that the strenuous work he has done all this year will have a bad effect on his salary whip, that the old cunning won't be there, but it's a cinch that whenever Manager Bernhard decides to start him that he will be found there in the box delivering the very best he has in him.

HITS and headlines have been George's specialty, and you might say his middle name, ever since he hopped into the pastime, and that was many years ago. No one knows exactly. For George is a little reticent—to say the least—about announcing the date that a Paterson (N. J.) doctor walked out and told Papa Merritt it was a boy.

George was but 14 years old before he was starring on the Paterson Sluggers, the hottest amateur team that ever tore up a Paterson corner lot. They used to throw in 11 cents each and the victors, of course, copped the pot. Gradually the ante was raised to five bones, and when George started raking in his end of the spoils every week he decided that baseball was his meat.

GEORGE continued playing with the amateur organizations in and around Paterson until about the spring of 1900. The fever had gotten into his veins, and when a member of the Utica team came through Paterson on his way to join the New York League team, George decided to have a try with what he considered fast company. Up until then he had been playing any old position on the team and was fairly familiar with the ways of all. However, when he turned up at Utica the manager was in dire need of a hitting first baseman, so the Jerseyman said he was an infielder and he was slapped on the initial sack.

Here his ability with the bat cropped out and he became a permanent fixture. His stay with the Utica team was short, for a Pittsburg scout spied him. He looked like a promising youngster and was ordered to report to the Pirates. He did so on the day of President McKinley's assassination. That will perhaps give you a good idea as to just how long George has been at it.

For three years George was a main factor in the sailing of the Pirate craft, pitching part of the time and occasionally performing in a utility role. From Pittsburg Merritt went to Worcester, in the New England League. After several years in this organization he heard the call of his native heath and landed on the Jersey City team.

In the spring of 1911 George had his feathers ruffled in a round with Manager Jack Ryan when the latter wanted him to pitch a game when George thought his arm was in no condition. As a result of the argument Merritt arranged with George Stallings, then the manager of the Buffalo team, to obtain his release from Jersey City. Merritt hurled for the Bisons until he was purchased last June by Manager Bernhard.

The match was begun Friday afternoon. Ramspeck won the first set, 6-4. Carter took the second set, 6-1. The third set, 5-5, was called on account of darkness. It was played off this morning.

9 Matches Played In President's Cup

Bob Jones, Jr., Youngest Player in Tournament, Easy Winner Over Jackson, Score 4 Up 3 to Play.

Play was started yesterday afternoon in the first match rounds of the President's Cup tournament over the course of the Atlanta Athletic Club at East Lake.

In the first flight eight matches were played. The feature was the defeat of Jackson by R. T. Jones, Jr., the most diminutive player on the tournament, a bit of a kid in knee pants, who gives promise one day of becoming the greatest golfer of the club.

The results of the matches played follow:

First Flight—Eby defeated Davis, 2-1; V. Tilson defeated Cowes, 3-2; Smith defeated Raine, 1 up; R. T. Jones, Jr., defeated Jackson, 4-3; Block defeated Saul, 3-2; Rose defeated Cooper, 4-3; Darling defeated Ray, 3-2; Nichenor defeated Trippe, 5-4.

Third Flight—Nicholson defeated Walker, 1 up.

George Merritt, a Veteran, But Still a Valuable Man

The Turtles have been using Merritt in the outfield, in the infield and on the mound. He sure is a versatile performer.

GIL PRICE'S PITCHING AND CRACKER HITS SAVE POOR GAME FROM GOING WRONG

Crackers Win It Once and Then Try to Lose It a Half-Dozen Times. Brenton Hit Hard---Locals Haven't Lost a Game in Last Seven Starts.

By Percy H. Whiting.

IT may be, of course, that when age has mellowed our remembrance of yesterday's ball game it will linger in our mind as a great contest. But right now we seem to recall it as a fine conglomeration of hits, errors, miscues, mistakes and lumpy playing—with always the fine consolation that Atlanta won. The score was 7 to 6, and it seemed closer than that.

Also let it not be forgotten the Crackers haven't lost a ball game in their last seven starts. Five times they have won, twice they have tied.

Yesterday's contest consisted, on the Cracker's part, of making all the runs in the world in the first few innings and then seeing how close they could come to losing without doing it.

They came within about half a run of getting it tied up, too.

If Paul Musser hadn't been derricked just in time, and if Gilbert Price hadn't been pulled out of three bad holes by three sizzling double plays, the game would have gone to glory—and stayed there.

But let not the idea get abroad that the Atlanta pitchers were responsible for the fact that the lead was nearly drizzled away.

The infielders did their share. Every Cracker infielder made an error; Bisland made two and Price contributed one. It was ghastly fielding.

Price Saves Day.

Fortunately, Price is not easily perturbed. If he had been flutter-headed, he would have lost sure. As it was, he had to hurl his level best to escape alive.

The Crackers themselves showed a lot of recuperative powers, too. In three innings hand-running they got into trouble through their errors—and they pulled out again with double plays. And their hitting put the game on ice right at the start, though there were times through the torrid afternoon when it appeared likely that the ice was going to melt away beneath that lead.

The game went off something like this:

In the first half of the first, Kyle hit, McDowell walked, the next two went out, Spencer lived on Agler's juggle and Kyle scored. On Williams' hit McDowell scored.

Then came a good play, for Welchonce threw to third in a fruitless attempt to head Spencer, and Wally Smith whipped the ball to Bisland, who tagged Williams trying to grab an extra base on the throw.

Soft for Crackers.

In the last of this inning the Crackers jounced Brenton for six hits and, thanks to the additional help of an error and a stolen base, scored five runs.

In the second Clancy's three-bagger and Musser's wild pitch let over another run.

In the third the Pelicans shaved off a bit of the lead when Hendryx hit a three-bagger, Bagby singled and Alperman yanked his one error. This gave the Pels two runs.

The Crackers got this brace right back in the third, and made the runs which saved the game. Bailey and Smith walked, Bisland sacrificed, Agler walked and Chapman doubled. That gave the Crackers a total of seven runs, and there the scoring ended. After that inning it proved impossible to bunch hits on Brenton.

Errors Crop Out.

The score was then 7 to 5. When Musser was benched in the third, Price took his place, and the only run scored during his service on the mound came in the fifth. And he wasn't much to blame, either. McDowell was safe on Wally Smith's wild throw. Hendryx filed to Long. Bagby got a scratch infield single. Bisland's error and Spencer's hit let the runner home; and the score was 7 to 6.

It remained there, too, despite three earnest attempts on the part of the Crackers to toss it away.

Price really pitched masterly ball, and such honors as go with a rather mediocre game belong to him. Chapman played a nice game and his double in the third inning really decided the contest in favor of the Crackers.

FOOD FOR SPORT FANS

By GEORGE E. PHAIR.

ODE TO ETAH.

Maud Muller, on a Summer day,
Is sitting in a cabaret,
And if she drinks her drinks frappe
You scarce can blame poor Maud today.

As we gaze at the thermometer we are reminded of two branches of the bug family—one which dopes out baseball trades and one which runs marathon races.

Jimmy Lavender arises to remark that he can not pitch in hot weather. But will James kindly tell us if there is any brand of weather in which he can pitch?

It is rumored that Larry Lajoie is no longer a regular player, but any American League pitcher will vouch for the fact that he is a regular hitter.

It thrills a sportsman's heart to read a polo story depicting the fact that Mrs. J. Oscar Umph-Umph wore a gown of rose crepe de foulard, cut on the bias, or words to that effect.

Polo is a great little sport, except for the fact that the ponies have nothing to do but work.

COOLING THOUGHT.

It cools one's brow to think of Johnny Evers, gaunt and grim.
One has no Joseph Tinker there to make it hot for him.

MR. M'GRAW DISCOVERS.

"I used to think a pitcher could not hit,"
Said John McGraw.
"It was before a pitcher swung his mitt Upon my jaw."

STRONG MEN ARE WINNERS; ANYBODY CAN DEVELOP IF HE WILL DO REGULAR WORK

Joe Bean Outlines Another Series of 'Men-Building' Exercises---How to Develop the Chest and Shoulders, by Simple Home Work.

By Joe Bean.

TWO men are walking down the street. One has stooped shoulders, a flat chest and a pair of arms the same general shape as a couple of lead pencils, that dangle off the man as though they didn't belong.

The other has broad, well-shaped shoulders, a high, full chest, and a strong, useful pair of arms.

Which one do you look at?

Which one is likely to be the successful man and which one the failure?

If they went together to ask for a job, which would get it?

The answer is too easy. The "MAN" would get the call. The weakling would get left.

If YOU will follow the course that is being published in The Atlanta American and stick 'till the finish and take your work REGULARLY, I'll put you in the class of .300 hitters, too—the men with real bodies, the men who make good.

I don't care whether you are young, middle aged or old; if you will follow this course, it will not only better your health, but it will help you in your business.

It will rid you of the well-known tired feeling. It will build you up to a point where if you are called on for extra effort you will be able to respond.

You will be able to run for a car without staggering.

You will be able to do a day's work—to realize on your physical resources.

If you are in business and can't get chough outdoor exercise don't say to yourself, "I get plenty of exercise out of my work." You don't, if you are penned up in an office all day. You try this course. If it isn't doing you a lot of good I'll refund the price of admission.

The series given to-day deals with the development of the chest—and especially with broadening the chest.

There are many exercises that will do this work well. In the accompanying cut I have attempted to show some that are simple and beneficial.

No matter what your age, size, weight and strength is, systematic exercise will improve you.

You Can Build Up.

Every man—and especially every young man—desires a good, broad chest. He wants also good shoulders and arms.

The exercise I am outlining in The Atlanta American each Sunday will give them to you about as quickly as they can be secured and without any great amount of exertion either.

But you MUST do them REGULARLY. By "regularly" I mean EVERY SINGLE DAY. Don't skip them once—no matter how tired or how hot you are. TAKE THEM. Demonstrate to yourself that you are man enough to do it.

If you will study carefully the pictures and the following rules you will get the idea about these exercises:

Here Are the Exercises.

Figure No. 3—Here is another exercise. It puts much more tension on the chest, as the stepping forward allows the shoulders to spread more. This broadens the chest and at the same time develops the muscles. Figure No. 1 shows the first position in this exercise, too.

Figure No. 4—Here is an exercise that produces a still greater expansion and broadening effect. This is accomplish by lying in bed, with the shoulders resting on the edge of the bed and the head dropped back. Start with hands at sides and bring them up above the head, keeping them parallel and reaching as far over the head as possible. This raises the chest and develops the shoulders, chest and neck.

All these exercises can be done in your room at home and the profits will be double the expense.

Each exercise should be done about fifteen times at first and later increased five times each week for several weeks.

Joe Bean Illustrates Exercises Which Will Broaden Chest, Expand Lungs, Develop Shoulders--Try Them

Picture No. 1 shows first position in chest developing exercise. It is also the preliminary position for the second exercise as well. These pictures tell the story of the exercises better than words could.

Cut No. 2 shows second position in chest exercise. Raise on toes and spread arms. This broadens chest. It also develops shoulders and back muscles. Start slowly on these exercises. Take more as your muscles improve.

No 3 is another chest developer. No. 4 shows another exercise. This may be done on a bed. It is a wonder for developing the chest. Try it regularly.

TINKER TELLS PITCHERS NOT TO WALK SLUGGERS

CINCINNATI, OHIO, July 5.—Joe Tinker, boss of the Reds, has ordered the abandonment of an extremely ancient custom—that of passing a heavy hitter to get at a weak one. No trick in the valendar causes as much wrath among the bugs as this, but Tinker isn't playing to popular approval in ordering his pitchers to discontinue the idea.

What's the use? says Joe. The percentage, even with a big slugger, is 3 to 1 against him and in favor of the pitcher. Why not go right after him? Why decrease your own per cent of advantage by putting another runner on the bases, especially when the other fellows can yank out their weak hitter and send a tough pinch hitter in his place? That play is off the map for his club hereafter.

O'ROURKE SIGNS CONTRACT TO MANAGE CARL MORRIS

NEW YORK, July 5.—Tom O'Rourke has signed a contract to manage Carl Morris, the Oklahoma giant, for a period of three years, and as soon as there is a chance for a match here Morris will start for this city.

O'Rourke also holds a contract on the services of Albert Palzer, who is out on the Iowa farm, rapidly regaining his health and strength. Palzer recently submitted to a serious operation by a New York surgeon. It was successful, and the big fighter now feels sure that he will whip all the white hopes.

Until Palzer is able to stand training O'Rourke intends to develop Morris. The veteran manager says that Morris' great strength and pluck are unexcelled by any of the leading heavyweights, and that Carl simply lacks knowledge of ring tactics. As soon as he learns how to hit, O'Rourke believes that the Oklahoma mastodon will reclimb the ladder.

NORDYKE QUITS AS UMPIRE.

PORTLAND, July 5.—Lou Nordyke, veteran player, telegraphed from Spokane his resignation as umpire of the Northwest League to Fielder Jones, president of the league. "I could get along with the boys when I was one of them," telegraphed Nordyke, "but as an umpire they look different."

HOBBY'S BROTHER A STAR; GAINING FAME AS SLUGGER

CINCINNATI, OHIO, July 5.—Clinton Hoblitzel, younger brother of Dick Hoblitzel, of the Cincinnati Reds, has been elected captain of the High School baseball team of Parkersburg, W. Va., for the season of 1914. The selection was made by the unanimous vote of his teammates.

Young Hoblitzel is an outfielder and a heavy sticker in his class, giving promise of following in the footsteps of his distinguished brother, who started his baseball career as captain of this same school team.

CONNIE MACK WANTS FORD; WOULD TRADE OUTFIELDER

PHILADELPHIA, July 5.—Connie Mack is willing to let New York have one of his extra outfielders, Jimmy Walsh or Pete Daley, the coast star, provided Frank Chance desires to turn over to him Russell Ford. Mack when asked concerning the report which emanated from New York that Chance desired an Athletic outfielder stated he would be willing to hand over either player mentioned for Ford.

"But, you know," said Mack, with that quizzical smile of his, "there is no hope of getting Chance to let Ford come our way."

.300 Batters Are Less Plentiful

D. Robertson Leads in Southern

THE .300 hitters in the Southern League are becoming less numerous. The number has dropped to 11 now, with the prospects bright that it will slump to one figure before long.

D. Robertson, Elberfeld, Long, Smith, Knisely and Welchonce are still the leaders, in the order named—that is, through Tuesday's games. Stock, of Mobile, is the league's best base thief, Robertson is the champion slugger, and Tommy Long has scored the most runs. Here are the averages of those who hit .200 or better:

MACK HURLERS BEST; BENDER GOING STRONG

THE unanimity with which the Philadelphia pitchers hover around the top in the American League pitching averages prove either that the Athletic hurlers are wonders, that the team behind them can't be beaten, regardless or the pitching—or both.

Anyhow, Plank, Bender and Houck are one-two-three among the regular hurlers, while Brown and J. Bush are seventh and eighth among those who have taken part in more than ten games. Here are the averages up to July 2:

DEMAREE NOW CLIMBING; HE'S IN SIXTH PLACE

WHEN the books closed on the night of July 2 for this week's crop ot pitching averages, Seaton, of the Phillies, was ahead, with the Old Master, Colonel Christopher Mathewson, veteran of the War of 1812 and several since that time, a most impressive second. Demaree, of the Gulls last year, is riding on the Giant wave, and is up in sixth place among the National League hurlers.

Two Major Castoffs Are Sure to Return

Morgan and McQuillan Do Great Work for Class AA League Clubs.

Two pitchers who were cast off by major league clubs seem destined for another try in the big show next year. They are Cy Morgan, of Kansas City, and George McQuillan, of Columbus.

Failure to keep in condition was responsible for both of them departing the major circuits. Both have settled down, and either would help out a lot of clubs that are now faltering.

Morgan and McQuillan have already won over 15 games this season. Mons. Hedges should have no regrets at having traded Lefty George for George Stovall. Lefty won six and lost eight battles for the Toledo club, where he was sent after being found wanting at Cleveland.

HICKMAN IS SCOUT FOR NAPS.

CLEVELAND, OHIO, July 5.—Charley Hickman, the old Toledo player, now coaching the University of West Virginia team, is to go with the Cleveland club as a scout.

M'DONALD AND CRAVATH STARS OF OLD LEAGUE

CRAVATH, of the Phillies, and McDonald, of Boston, divide the honors in the National League batting race. McDonald has the better average by 66 points, but he has been in less games than the Philadelphian.

The real feature is the excellent batting of Jake Daubert. The ex-Southern Leaguer is hitting .342. Wingo, the St. Louis catcher, and a Georgian by birth, is also batting .342. Titus is slumping, but Wagner holds his own at .329. The average of all who batted over .220 through Wednesday follow:

KILBANE WANTS FIGHT, BUT HE CAN'T GET BOUT

Turned Down by Promoters Who Are Unable to Secure an Opponent for Him.

LOS ANGELES, July 5.—Johnny Kilbane, featherweight champion, is in the most extraordinary predicament that any champion ever found himself. He is so brilliantly, sparklingly, bewilderingly clever that the public doesn't care to see him box. He is the lonesomest fighter who ever lived.

No promoter cares to risk much on a Kilbane fight because no featherweight can be found near enough to Kilbane's class to make it even interesting.

A Kilbane fight resembles, more than anything else, an exhibition of shadow boxing with one entirely superfluous person in the ring.

Kilbane has fought himself out of a fortune. He has fought the featherweight division into innocuous desuetude. He is in about the position of a manufacturing agent trying to sell wireless telegraph apparatus to a South African cannibal tribe.

He is a very modest boy; but he has to confess his discouragement about the situation.

Johnny Is Disappointed.

"I am disappointed in my position as champion of the world," he said. "Attell, when he was champion, had more fights than he could attend to. He fought all the time; and here I can't get fights. Attell fought a great many draws and even lost some fights, but it didn't affect his standing with the public.

"Since becoming the champion I have fought everyone who wanted a fight and I have won every fight except this Dundee affair, and I have my own opinion about that draw decision.

"I can't see why I should be punished by the people because these boys can't hit me.

"Well, I'm ready to fight as hard as anybody fought in a ring the first time I find a boy who can do something. It seems a shame I should be blamed because I box scientifically instead of slamming around in the ring like a roustabout on a wharf.

Dundee Made Fight Bad.

"Was it my fault because Dundee was a boob who can't box? I could stand all night in a ring and Dundee couldn't hit me. I'll tell you the truth; the night of our fight he was so clumsy that I thought he was going to foul me all the time. Honestly, he used to close his eyes when he hit. Once I avoided a bad foul as he waded in with his eyes shut, by turning my hip.

"The funny part of all this is," continued Johnny, "that I never have taken such an awful lot of interest in fighting as fighting. I perfected myself in the art of boxing and won the championship purely for the money I hoped to make out of it. I guess I made too good a job of it."

CHICAGO CLUB WINNER OF JUNIOR A. A. UNION MEET

CHICAGO, July 5.—Chicago Athletic Association athletes ran away with point honors in the National Junior A. A. U. meet at Grant Park yesterday. The team captured first place in seven of the eighteen events, taking 42 points. Captain A. W. Kohler, of Michigan, was individual star, taking all the eleven points his school got. Lund, of the Irish-American Athletic Club, New York, broke the only record of the day, throwing the javelin 148 feet 8 inches, a new junior mark.

A feature of the day was the victory of James Ray, of the Illinois Athletic Club, over Strobine, an Olympic point winner in the five-mile run. Ray lay back until nearly the last lap, when he shot ahead and finished 30 yards in front of Strobine, who set the pace practically all the way. The time was 26:39.

HEINRICH SCHMIDT LOSES TO EX-FRENCH CHAMPION

LA BOULIE, FRANCE, July 5.—W. Heinrich Schmidt, of Worcester, Mass., was defeated yesterday in the third round of the tournament of the amateur golf championship of France by Peters Gannon, of Argentina. Gannon was amateur champion of France in 1910.

In the same round C. W. Inslee, of the Oneida Community Club, New York, beat Blandford, of England, by 5 up and 4 to play.

H. W. Stucklen, former champion of Massachusetts was beaten by E. A. Lassen, the British amateur champion of 1908, by 4 up and 2 to play.

WILLIAMS TO CLAIM TITLE; M'CAREY WARNS COULON

LOS ANGELES, CAL., July 5.—Promoter McCarey has wired Johnny Coulon that if he does not come through to-day with an agreement to defend his title Kid Williams will be declared the champion of the world and will become the possessor of the McCarey belt, emblematic of the title.

McCarey wants to see an active champion at the head of the bantam division, and if he puts Williams to the front as champion it is safe to state that the Baltimore boy will be busy from now on.

"DOYLE HITTING, GIANTS UNBEATABLE"—STALLINGS

NEW YORK, July 5.—"Larry Doyle has recovered his old form and that is why the Giants are now leading the National League," said George Stallings, manager of the Boston Braves, to-day. "Until recently Doyle was unable to hit with his usual vigor and the Giants were losing games. But they braced the moment Larry's bat began to meet the ball successfully. He is the king pin of the New York team, and now that he is himself McGraw's men can not be headed off.

I.-M. LEAGUE TO CONTINUE.

BLOOMINGTON, ILL., July 5.—At a special meeting of the Illinois-Missouri League here yesterday, it was voted to continue the league, the other clubs agreeing to assist Pekin, which is in bad shape financially. Pitcher Hickstein, of Pekin, was returned to Bloomington.

ZEIDER OUT OF GAME.

NEW YORK, July 5.—Second Baseman Rollo Zeider, of the Yankees, will be on the disabled list for several weeks, as he is laid up from the effect of an operation on one of his feet. He had a narrow escape from blood poisoning.

NATIONAL LEAGUE

GIANTS, 3; DODGERS, 2.

BROOKLYN, July 5.—Mathewson, pitching in his best form, enabled the Giants to defeat Brooklyn on a muddy field this afternoon, 3 to 2. Mathewson did not exert himself except when the bases were full. Then he would tighten up and leave the locals a long distance from the home plate. The three runs in the sixth were made by hard and successive hits by the Giants, Mathewson opening the inning with a single to center. In this inning Fischer split his thumb and was relieved by Heckinger, and Stack replaced Ragon. The box score:

PIRATES-CARDS; RAIN.

PITTSBURG, July 5.—The game to-day between the Pirates and Cardinals was called in the first inning on account of darkness. In their start the Cardinals had two men out when Oakes hit for a single, but was thrown out attempting to steal second. For the Pirates Byrne went out on a foul fly to Wingo and Carey struck out. Then the game was called. Hendrix and Perritt were the opposing pitchers.

RAIN BEATS BRAVES.

PHILADELPHIA, July 5.—Rain saved the Phillies a defeat and robbed Boston of a victory this afternoon when, after four and a half innings were played, with Boston leading by a score of 4 to 0, a thunderstorm broke loose, necessitating the game being called. The Braves had scored their four runs in the first inning. The thermometer, which had registered 95 before the storm broke, dropped 23 degrees.

American League Results

WHITE SOX, 5; NAPS, 5.

CLEVELAND, OHIO, July 5.—Clever stalling as stormclouds settled down over the diamond saved the White Sox from defeat to-day after Cleveland had tied the score in the seventh. As a storm of cyclonic fury neared the ball grounds Cleveland tied the score on Scott, and with two on and two out, the pitcher walked Jackson to gain time while great masses of dust swept over the diamond and it became almost as dark as night. Lajoie, blinded by the dust, filed and the game was called, for the rain then came down in torrents. The box score:

ATHLETICS, 7; RED SOX, 6.

BOSTON, July 5.—To Leonard's blowup in the seventh inning, Bostonians attribute the loss of to-day's game to the Athletics 7 to 6, but Speaker's muff in the same inning which was followed by Baker's two-bagger was responsible for three of the five runs scored in that session. Bush fooled the local batsmen for a time, but in the seventh he passed Engle, and Wagner tripled. Thomas, batting for Carrigan, got to first on an infield error. Bender then relieved him. Hooper doubled, scoring Wagner and Thomas. After that, though Speaker and Henricksen hit safely, the big chief held them safe. Schang's throwing to bases was sensational. The box score:

TIGERS, 7; BROWNS, 5.

ST. LOUIS, MO., July 5.—Although St. Louis got away with three runs in the first inning, Detroit bunched hits in the fourth and sixth innings, driving Weilman from the box. The final score was 7 to 5, in favor of the Tigers. Neat fielding by Lavan for the Browns helped to rob the visitors of numerous hits, as he figured in two snappy double plays. He also scored one run. High featured in the batting, getting a double and two singles out of four times at the bat. Hall, in the early innings, was very wild, but settled down, and in the late innings had the Browns helpless until the ninth, when a lucky home run by Compton, who was pinch-hitting for Allison, cleared the right field fence, but the blow came with two out and none on bases. BILLIKENS, 7; VOLS, 2.

NASHVILLE, TENN., July 5.—Elmer Brown twirled masterly ball for the Billikens, easily holding the Vols in check on the few occasions they had runners on, while two Nashville pitchers were slaughtered, Brackenridge being knocked out in the third. Score, 7 to 2. Redding pitched great ball for a few rounds, but exploded in the eighth. Brown's circuit smash over the right field fence in the third, with the bases empty, featured the affair. DIVIDE DOUBLE BILL.

CHATTANOOGA, July 5.—Chattanooga and Memphis split a doubleheader this afternoon, the Turtles annexing the first at the expense of Howell, 4 to 2, while Grimes held the invaders safe throughout in the second, getting a five-run lead in the first inning. The final score was 11 to 5.

Newton pitched good ball for Memphis in the opener, but Harrell was literally slaughtered in the second. King, the first man up, greeted him with a clean home run to deep right-center, and singles by Flick and Coyle, a second home run over the left field fence by Johnson and a triple by Fitzgerald followed in rapid succession. Bernhardt refused to relieve him, however, because of a game at Memphis to-morrow with the Gulls and a double-header Monday with Atlanta, following four games in two days here. He had no other man available.

Poor base running was practically responsible for the loss of the first game by the locals. Elston went in as a pinch hitter in the first game and played three innings, but retired in the second, suffering with a charley horse. The box scores:

Heisman Gives Advice to Umpires

Arbiters Should Follow Plays

By J. W. Heisman.

IN my last story I wrote of the way an umpire should handle the decisions that come up in a ball game while he is standing back of the catcher and home plate. Problems of a somewhat different nature often confront him when he takes his stand out in the field of play behind the pitcher.

The umpire should take this latter position whenever a man gets on base, with the idea of being nearer to the scene of action in case he should be called upon to render a base decision.

From this position he will find that he has a better view of the plate and of pitched balls than when behind the catcher, for the reason that the pitcher in front of him will not interfere so much with his view of these plays as does a catcher.

Standing behind the pitcher an umpire must always be expectant of the pitcher or catcher throwing to a base to nail a runner, and he should be sure to follow the play carefully or else he will find that something has happened without his knowledge. He should be quick to apprehend a throw of the pitcher down to second, and be sure to jump quickly out of the way.

Must Get Close to Play.

The point that I consider most important of all for an umpire to bear in mind, is to get as close as possible to the base at which you expect to have to make a decision, without being or getting in the way of the play itself.

Suppose a man is on first and the batter hits safely to right with the hit and run on. It is certain the runner on first will attempt to take third on the hit, and the right fielder will make his throw to that sack. In such case the umpire ought to be within a couple of feet of third base at the time the throw and the runner get there, in order that he may be in the best possible position to judge. The same rule holds good for other plays at other bases; and if it appears that there is likely to be a double play he should have the second play in mind and get after that one also. For the life of me I can't understand why so many umpires think all in the world they have to do is to stand in one place, look wise and make the best guess they can. If they would only MOVE and get about the field, the same as a referee and umpire have to do in football, they would find themselves working into positions where they could give decisions that would meet with more general satisfaction.

Take the case of a fly ball or line drive hit right down the first or third base line. Often enough an umpire has plenty of time in which to run over and sight along the line before the ball hits the ground, but half of them never stir out of their tracks. This is the result of laziness and such a man is unfit to umpire a game; if it is mere thoughtlessness the fault should be corrected, and can easily be.

Don't Argue With Players.

Some players seem born to kick in ball games, whether they are captain or not. If I were umpiring a game I would never listen to anybody but the captain, and not him except in case of his differing with me as to the wording or interpretation of a rule, never in case of a question of fact. There is no reason on earth why baseball players should be allowed to argue and delay games as much as they do. It is not permitted in tennis, basket ball, football, track or any other sports. In fact, it would be very bad form for players to question an official's decision in other sports the way they do in baseball, and certainly in no other country are officials treated with the general discourtesy that we see exhibited by players to umpires in every baseball game in this country.

But if, in umpiring a game, I found I had made a mistake, whether in interpreting a rule or in deciding a question of fact, I would certainly have no hesitation whatever in reversing my decision on the spot. The prevalent idea that after an umpire has once made a decision he can not change it is nonsense. Of course he could not do so after the game had gone on a while, other players come to the bat, etc. But if before any further playing has been done the umpire ascertains that he has made a mistake he can undoubtedly reverse his decision. In fact, we see it done every day. An umpire calls the runner safe, but right after, or soon thereafter, observes that the fielding player or baseman did not catch and hold the ball as he, the umpire, at first supposed he had. Clearly the runner should have been called safe, and what choice has the umpire but to reverse his decision and call him so?

Umps Fooled in Trapped Ball.

Quite often an umpire is called upon to decide whether an outfielder caught a ball before it touched the ground or whether he got it on a trap. Too many umpires are fooled by the clever acting of the outfielder who pretends always that he caught it on the fly, whether he really did or not. Umpires should entirely disregard the actions and behavior of the player after getting the ball, and judge entirely from the way his eyes saw the play. This same proposition confronts an umpire every time he has to make a base decision where the runner only got the base, if at all, by a clever slide around behind the baseman and the latter had a hard time getting to him to put the ball on him. Both players will try to "pull the wool" over the umpire's eyes by their actions, which should be strictly disregarded. The only way to make sure that your eyesight alone shall be the test of whether the man is out or not is to run close up on the play and BE ON HAND so you can see for yourself.

Many first basemen have a habit of pulling their heel off the bag before they catch the ball. An umpire should be careful to note whether the first baseman's foot is in contact with the sack at the instant of catching the ball or not. He should also be sure to follow the course of the runner all the way around the diamond and observe whether he touches all the bases. Most umpires are watching the fielding of the ball, which is really none of their affair at all, instead of watching what the base runner is doing. The ball will come in all right some way or other, and it is proper that you should have your eyes on what is happening on the bases rather than the way the outfielders are getting the ball back into the diamond.

Umpires must also take firmly in hand the matter of spectators crowding out toward or upon the diamond. If he can not get them back himself he should hold the home management responsible for this disorder, and, after giving them a reasonable time in which to get the spectators back, he should notify them that unless they succeed in clearing them away within two minutes more he will award the game to the visiting team.

Arbiters Should Know Rules.

Umpiring is like playing in one respect, and that is that the more experience one gets the more proficient are they apt to become. That and these few hints may be of much benefit to one contemplating doing some of this work; but above all make sure that you know the rules. You may think you know them because you have a general idea of how the game is played, but anyone who thinks they know every rule in baseball will do well to go right out and buy a rulebook and read it through very carefully from beginning to end, and if they don't find at least a dozen things in the game that they never heard of before the circus lemonade is on me.

Johnston Will Steal 100 Bases This Year

Chattanooga Lad Has Already Pilfered 50 Sacks in 85 Games With Seals.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., July 5.—Jimmy Johnston, the Chattanooga lad now with San Francisco, is setting up a new stolen base mark in the Pacific Coast League. He has already stolen over 50 bases in 85 games and at this rate will steal far more than 100 bases in a season. Jimmy hopes to make the mark at least 125 before the season is over, a record that has never been equaled in the annals of the professional sport.

A sample of the work Jimmy is doing is seen in the following excerpt from The San Francisco Examiner regarding a game against Venice in which Jimmy recently participated:

"Jimmy Valentine Johnston stole yesterday's ball game right out from beneath the nostrils of H. Hogan's Venetians. Jeems' little stunt came in the ninth inning, when our beloved Seals were one run behind after one of the slowest and curiously enough one of the most thrilling nerve-racking battles the season has yet produced."

Two Local Tennis Stars Who Are at Their Best Now

BRYANT M. GRANT.

CARLETON SMITH.

FEDERAL LEAGUE TEAMS ON WESTERN INVASION

INDIANAPOLIS, July 5.—The Federal League's Western invasion will open Monday, July 7, when Chicago will play at Kansas City, President John T. Powers said early to-day before departing for his home in Chicago. It is believed, league officials assert, that all work necessary to transfer the Covington team to Kansas City will have been completed by that time.

Edward Eckblad Is Foremost White Hope

That's Real Name of Gunboat Smith, Who Is Among Leading Heavyweights.

ST. PAUL, MINN., July 5.—The Gibbons brothers of St. Paul are not the only Minnesotans who are top-notchers in the squared circle, for no less a personage than Gunboat Smith, at present leading figure in the white hope brigade, started his journey to fame from this State. "Gunboat" Smith's real name is Edward Eckblad. He was brought up in Milica Township. His mother, who is now Mrs. Rosen, still lives in that township.

Who Was Most Useful Player?

S. Smith, Maybe, or Molesworth

By Percy H. Whiting.

IF somebody should walk up to you and say, "Here's $10,000 I want you to present to the most useful player who ever performed in the Southern League."

Who would you give it to?

What man, exclusive of managers, has done the most for his team toward winning games in this Southern League?

WHAT constitutes a "useful" player? you ask.

Well, here are some the qualifications.

No. 1—He must bat tolerably well, preferably something over .300.

No. 2—He must field well. His average does not cut so much of a figure as his willingness to go after everything and his ability to get some of the things he goes after.

No. 3—He must hav intelligence; must be a quick thinker.

No. 4—He should be able to run bases moderately well.

No. 5—He must have a good disposition, not be quarrelsome, not be a quitter, not a grouch, not a trouble maker.

No. 6—He must have good habits, so that he can always play to the best of his natural ability and so that he may not lead other players outside the paths of decent living.

THE most valuable man in the first two years of the league's existence was Ed Abbatticchio. He won two pennants for Nashville. His good playing, hard hitting, his great leadership and his quick thinking put the Vol team in a class by itself. Never since that time has any man stood out as Ed did.

MANY men who since leaving the the Southern League have become wonderful ball players lacked miles of being "the best" while they were here. Nap Rucker, for example, best of southpaws now, couldn't hold a job with Atlanta. Joe Jackson and Tris Speaker were tremendous hitters in this league, but there their usefulness ended. Jackson very nearly batted the Pelicans into first place, but he was a lemon otherwise. Speaker was a rummy fielder on the worst fielding team the league ever saw—or nearly that, anyhow. Ed Eweeney, now one of the greatest of catchers, was only second string man with Atlanta. Jimmy Archer was a great catcher in his Cracker days, but somehow he hardly fills the requirements of the "best of all."

ONE player worthy of consideration is unquestionably A. Otto Jordan. In everything but batting ability Jordan was a wonder. He had almost as much to do with winning two pennants for Atlanta as "Old Abby" had to do with winning two for Nashville—but not quite. If Jordan had hit as well as Abbatticchio he would get the honor. He had all the other qualifications.

If Charley Babb hadn't been a manager, he would have to be considered. In his early days he was a marvel. He batted and fielded well, and—until his Angora departed—was a wonderful leader of men. He stands out in my memory as one of the very great players in the league.

ONE of the most helpful old codgers the league ever knew was "Daddy" Duggan, once of Memphis. This old chap had lost his speed, but he could hit the ball, and his kindly disposition, unruffled temper and good example did more than anything else to keep one Memphis pennant winner in its stride.

Another good old plugger worthy of mention was Clayton Perry. Year in and year out he has played good, clever, useful ball. He never hit much, but he was more useful to a team, especially during his younger days, than the mere averages showed.

Another player in that class was Dick Crozier. He did not hit hard enough to cinch a position in the hall of fame, but he helped every team he was with by his willingness, his cleverness and his good habits and behavior.

Another former Atlanta player who did not miss greatness much was J. Claudius Fox. The old boy, in the days when he was hitting, was a wonder. He was full of life and pep, played ball for the team and not for averages, set a good example on the field and off and helped out the Crackers.

Derrill Pratt and Red Smith were among the league's most useful citizens, the year they led the league in batting. They were high-class men, both of them, and helped their teams along. But they were a bit kiddish and inexperienced to deserve topmost ranking.

AND now, right here near the end, we're getting down to brass tacks. To our own somewhat biased notion there have been three amazingly helpful players in the Southern League. They are:

Sid Smith, Carleton Molesworth and Jake Daubert.

Sid had everything but the desired disposition. He was an awful crab. But he could bat. He fielded well and he could fill in at any position. He was a fighter and he never gave up. He didn't jolly the team along any, but he kept them playing ball. Sidney Smith, of South Carolina, will stand out for the next hundred years or so as one of the amazing players of the league.

Carleton Molesworth was a league wonder. For hitting .300 or better year after year his equal was never seen in the Southern. He was an elusive base runner, a grand fielder, had a good head. In his playing days he showed no special leadership or influence over men. But he must have had it up his sleeve somewhere, for he has surely shown it since he has been a manager.

And lastly Jake Daubert. This man was the best first baseman of all time in Dixie. He led the league in batting one year. He was a good diamond citizen. His habits were excellent, eh had a good head, was fast and clever. The league surely has seen no better.

Take your choice among the three.

Reds Are Composed Of Young Pastimers

Cincinnati Expert Ridicules Yarn That Club Is Home for Aged Ball Players.

CINCINNATI, July 5.—Criticism was made on the personnel of the Cincinnati Reds recently that the players are too old to deliver the goods and that that is the reason why they have occupied last place so long. The critic declares that the Cincinnati club was an old man's home and could never win until new life was instilled into it by the substitution of young men for the alleged "old-timers," who were said to be cluttering up the field.

Investigation shows that nothing could be further from the truth. As a matter of fact, the Reds, as now constituted, are one of the youngest clubs in the league.

Joe Tinker naturally is the oldest man in the regular line-up, and Joe is only 32 years old, and as fast as he ever was. Hoblitzel is only 24, though he has four years of experience as a major league first baseman.

Heine Groh is a youngster, and so is John Dodge, the latter having just passed his twentieth birthday. The infield is the youngest in the league, for if Almeida plays third he is only 26, and does not bring the average up very much. In the outfield Bob Bescher, the oldest man out there, is only 28, while Josh Devore is 24 and Marsans 25.

Some of the pitchers and catchers are older men, of course, which is as it should be. John Kling, the veteran of the club, is 37, but still in excellent form. Tom Clarke, who has been doing most of the work behind the bat this year, is only 24, and Earl Blackburn, the third backstop, has just turned 20.

Johnson Has 'Made' Baseball

Instituted Much Needed Reforms

By W. J. McBeth.

NEW YORK, July 5.—Organized baseball owes much to Ban Johnson. He broke in as a rebel chief, but once firmly established in power, became the big Czar Johnson through his American League instituting a number of long-needed reforms. He made of the much-abused umpire a national figure instead of a "scapegoat," and by forcing respect for him from the player eventually commanded also the veneration of fandom. It was Johnson who was largely instrumental in stamping out all forms of rowdyism upon the field. And when he had forced recognition to equality from the National League, he was one of the leading spirits for peace and good will toward one happy, concerted union for the common good.

The Johson regime marked a new era in professional baseball. He was at first looked upon with suspicion. It was not believed at the time he expanded to major league distinction that there was room for two big circuits. He not only proved that there was, but by furnishing the big cities of the country which are now represented in both National and American with high-class sport every day throughout the entire playing season, added such an impetus towards universal patronage that the great pastime has gone booming on more and more steadily with each succeeding season.

Competition is the life of all healthy sport, and so the American League, as a rival to the National, was just the proper thing to arouse such interest as is manifested at present. But for Ban Johnson's invasion of the parent major league territory it is doubtful if there would be any steel and concrete stands to-day. And it is doubtful also if Ty Cobbs would be demanding $15,000 salaries. For after the old war days the pay never did adjust itself to former planes.

Square Deal His Motto.

Wherefore, the American League—which, in the opinion of Mr. Johnson, is, after all, the only major league doing business—has the heartfelt thanks of all well wishers of the game. It has always been very popular with the public, and especially with the playing fraternity, for it has always stood for a square deal both for the patrons and the public. Still baseball frenzy is a law unto itself, and the very rivalry, friendly as it may be between the two major leagues, has left along the trail of the last decade two distinctive factions in fandom. One faction worships at the shrine of the National and another at the footstool of the American League.

Ever since the American League began to cater to the public fandom has argued over the relative strengths and merits of the two major leagues. The debate never will be closed so long as both continue to do business. The patronage of each is loyal still, and in the division of opinion lies the secret of box office receipts. A fan is ever open to argument; to conviction, never.

Leagues Are on a Par.

Baseball writers in the big cities where both major leagues are established are rather an unbiased lot. They are generally of the opinion that there is no appreciable difference in the respective strengths of the big leagues. And why should there be? The present-day magnate stands ready to sacrifice the limit of profits in the hunt for talent. Each club has its scouts scouring the country for new players. There is little choice among the rival managers. Each circuit boasts its great popular heroes.

There was a time when the American League overshadowed its tottering rival. That was back in the war days of ten years and more ago. The young circuit, in the hands of young and vigorous capital ists who had gone in on a gamble, put up the money to rob the National League of its best known stars. There was such an exodus of talent from the parent major that the old-established organization was left weak, indeed.

CAMPI TO MEET WINNER OF LEDOUX-WILLIAMS GO

LOS ANGELES, July 5.—Eddie Campi, the Pacific Coast bantamweight, has been engaged by Tom McCarey, fight promoter, to meet the winner of the Charlie Ledoux-Kid Williams fight which will be staged here on July 15. Campi recently defeated Ledoux in a 20-round battle.

Naps Are Real Fighting Team

Birmingham Is Ideal Manager

PHILADELPHIA, July 5.—Here's a brand new, fighting Irishman in the battle front of baseball, and when the names of McGraw, Jennings, Kelly, Clarke, Ewing, Tebeau, and other great Celts are mentioned hereafter, that of Joseph L. Birmingham, who has made the Cleveland team the surprise of the game this year, must be included.

Birmingham is a real boy manager. He won't be 28 until December 3, and he is the youngest manager that ever played in the major leagues.

"Birmy" has given the Naps a fighting spirit in contrast to the once meek aggregation ready to let the other fellow tramp upon its neck.

Critics who have picked the Athletics, Washington and Boston to run away, realize there is a new sort of ball team in Cleveland. Clark Griffith alone refuses to believe, and says Birmingham has "conned" the team into playing ahead of its natural gait.

UP to June 4 the team has knocked 35 pitchers from the box in winning 32 of the 45 games.

In twelve games they came from behind when seemingly beaten. They finish like the Detroit Club of other days. These things have made the fans talk about the boy manager who has made the team one of the best fighting machines in baseball.

Birmingham is a manager who would bring joy to the heart of Patsy Tebeau and that regal crew of his day. He broke a leg trying to turn defeat into victory and would have broken two could he have clinched the game.

No longer does "Birmy" sport crutches, but when his broken leg was torturing him at every move he was on the bench with the master baseball brain directing his team.

HE has erased the word "quit" from the Nap directory. There isn't a rule for his players to obey. "You're all men and know as well as I do how to care for yourselves," he told them. And not a player cuts loose. The others won't stand for it. The honor system works like a charm.

"Cross up the other fellow. Figure out what he expects and don't do it," are two Birmingham orders.

One day Birmingham bunted with two men out and the bases filled, winning the game. The team was a run behind and the time-honored thing was to hit the ball hard and pray for a hit. The bunt upset the opposing team, the pitcher went to pieces and had to be taken out.

Next day when the opponents were looking for bunts Birmingham ordered his players to slug. They knocked three pitchers from the box that day.

M'GRAW ROW RECALLS FIGHTS OF LONG AGO

Fierce Scraps Have Been Waged by New York Manager on Baseball Diamonds.

THERE have been many scraps on the ball field, and McGraw, who figured second best in his row with Brennan, has played a conspicuous part on and off the diamond.

Twenty years ago he had a quarrel with Eddie Burke, a sturdy little Celt on the New York team, and they had a fearful battle, Burke being in bed a week. Later, when Jack Doyle was with Baltimore, John McGraw tried to steal third and was caught a block. Returning to the bench, McGraw said: "I thought that was a good play just then." "I thought it was a heluva play," snarled Doyle, and the fight lasted fourteen minutes.

Seymour Loved War.

Cy Seymour loved war, and had many scraps, his last of any note being with Arlie Latham, who was too old and too small for Cy, and was easily defeated. Big Bill Lange was the best-natured man on earth, but when Jack O'Brien, the second baseman, cursed him one afternoon a great battle began and lasted till players and umpires interfered.

Joe Tinker is a neat boxer and dead game. Two of his best bouts were with Dick Egan and John Evers, both being equal, in style and speed, to most ring encounters. Davy Jones, a quick man with a feminine voice, is brave, and one afternoon attacked Jim McAleer. McAleer, who is a mighty fighter, upset Davy and then spanked him. Twenty years back McAleer and his boss, Pat Tebeau, went to war, and McAleer trimmed Pat most merrily.

Clarke vs. Bowerman.

A fight of undying fame was waged between Fred Clarke and Frank Bowerman and took place in a ball club box office, Bowerman, much the taller, winning out. One of the best fighters of the past was Tony Mullane, who had numerous mills, his most noted, perhaps, being a defeat of Bob Gilks. Another fighter of cold and icy ways was Elton Chamberlin. Jocko Halligan, a hardy outfielder who liked to mill, thrashed Cub Stricker one night and then went after Chamberlin, whom he found in a saloon. Halligan crept cautiously up behind Chamberlin, wholly innocent of the fact that Elton was watching his approach in the big mirror back of the bar. Just as Halligan made ready for a spring Chamberlin wheeled and flattened him with a bar mallet.

Ganley Used Bat.

Bill Burns, the left-handed pitcher, leaped for Bob Ganley one afternoon and Ganley caught him on the ribs with a bat, putting Bill out of commission for many days. Hobe Ferris, the famous Boston second baseman, lost his temper at Jack Hayden one day and kicked him in the face with his spiked shoes, ruining Hayden's dentistry completely. Roger Connor and Jim O'Rourke contracted enmity when both were with the Giants, but never got a fair chance to settle it till more than fifteen years later. Then, when both were leaders of little minor teams, they met at a railroad station one night and fought with much spirit, but great feebleness till the laughing players parted them.

McGraw Had Many Mills.

John McGraw had many mills. Dick Harley spiked him—spiked him so badly he had to give up active play—and McGraw, rising, bleeding and raging, slugged Harley till the umpires butted in. This happened in Baltimore. McGraw also battled with Bugs Raymond, winning from the pitcher, and tackled Paul Sentell, the Italian infielder, then with the Phillies. Sentell beat him handily. Tyrus Cobb fought half the Tiger team, his battles with Schmidt and Crawford being most notable. Bob Bescher and Roger Bresnahan had a royal fight in 1911, and, while they mixed it, two small men—Johnny Bates and Arnold Hauser—fought a much prettier, more scienced mill alongside, with nobody even looking at them.

Sherwood Magee, of the Phillies, a few years ago, lost his head completely during a game in Philadelphia with St. Louis when ordered out of the contest by Umpire Finneran. He swung hard on the umpire's jaw, and the latter went to the grass for the full count and over. For this act Magee drew down the heaviest punishment ever accorded a ball player in the National League.

S. ATLANTIC LEAGUE

SAVANNAH, 5; CHARLESTON, 1.

SAVANNAH, July 5.—Savannah downed Charleston for the third successive time in the series this afternoon when they eked out an easy win over that clan with a 5-to-1 count. Taylor, who pitched for the visitors, was hit hard at times, and his support wobbled in the pinches. A great running catch by Mayer in right field was the fielding feature of the day. The box score:

Until the lucky seventh not a Jacksonvillian reached first base. Voss opened this fatal round by hitting Starr and this followed by Melchoir's bingle, and Hoffman's triple put three runs across the pan. The box score:

ACCIDENTS CUT LARGE FIGURE IN DIXIE RACE

CHATTANOOGA, TENN., July 5. Announcement from Mobile that "Baby Doll" Jacobson and Charley Starr will be out of the game for weeks adds another chapter to the longest list of serious accidents that ever marred a Southern League season. While Gillespie, of Chattanooga; Yantz, of New Orleans, and Dilger, of Birmingham, are the only players who have been knocked out for the season, many others have been hurt so seriously as to prevent them from participating in the pastimes of their clubs for weeks.

Repeated accidents have necessitated pitchers and catchers working in many games out of their positions. Mobile has utilized Campbell and Hogg. 'Andsome 'Arry McIntyre has subbed on numerous occasions. Memphis has played few games without the services of Old George Merritt. Chattanooga used Hannah and Golden in utility roles, and Atlanta had Catcher Graham in the outfield for weeks, and these all in addition to the regular utility man who is on the payroll of each club.

MOBILE has been perhaps the most unfortunate of all in recent weeks, though the Gulls were remarkably lucky while obtaining their long lead. The Gulls missed Paulet for a few games at the start, Campbell going to right and Robertson to first. Then they got together and with a regular line-up began to climb rapidly, soon amassing a big lead. Two weeks ago hard luck returned and today finds the Gulls much nearer the rest of the teams and still slipping. Starr suffered a broken hand and still carries the injured member in a sling. Jacobson's injury is more serious as a permanent problem. It consists of a strained side and fever which has weakened him so that he may not play for two months.

Chattanooga's dose at the hands of fate is well known. Jimmy Gillespie is out for the year and drawing a salary from the coffers of the club while he recovers from the effect of a terrible blow on the head by a ball pitched by Hardgrove. Kid Elberfeld is now out of the game from another "beaning" process, and at least one game, if not two, has already been lost on account of the mishap. The team was fortunate in having a utility man to thrust into the breach in Williams, and in the Gillespie case in getting another third sacker who, while not quite as good as Jimmy, is good enough to keep third base from being a sieve.

Birmingham is another club that has suffered heavily. Dilger, the Barons' first catcher and one of the best throwers in the league, was the first to receive a serious injury and a break to put him out of it for the year. The club's two highest-priced players, who cost $5,000 to purchase them—Knisely and McDonald—have been repeatedly out of the game on account of injuries or sickness. Marcan has also been crippled, but forced to play most of the time from dire necessity. The Baron list was increased last week by a most serious blow. Hardgrove, the club's leading pitcher, being struck in the face by a batted ball and rendered hors de combat for weeks.

MEMPHIS was always "jonahed," and Bernhard has had a hospital list full ever since he took the reins of the club. This year the absence of Schweitzer doubtless has injured the club considerably. Center Fielder Love has also been out frequently. Bill has been able to keep his infield intact, however, and with battery men also unscathed has been much more fortunate than in former seasons.

Atlanta has had but two serious mishaps since the season started. Bailey was out for several weeks with a strain. Chapman, the second catcher, has just returned to the game on account of a broken finger, and Joe Dunn has wilted under the strain of too much work behind the counting station.

Nashville has been uniformly lucky. Young was ill for a time during the first of the season, but the infield has presented an unbroken front up to Gealby's injury this week.

Down at New Orleans, George Yantz's fatal "broken slide" to second in a game with Chattanooga in May put him out of commission until August, with a busted ankle. Other members of the Pels have been out for a few days with minor injuries, but the blow to Yantz was the most serious.

THE league's record of the past four seasons is liberally sprinkled with injuries to star players—Scotty Walker, Champ Osteen, Roy Ellam and many others being knocked out for practically entire seasons and leaving weak spots which were rarely patched up. And, generally, the pennant-winning club has been the one fortunate enough to escape the hospital.

The frequent serious injuries to regular players make the utility man a valuable institution. How the Southern clubs managed to drag along without one in the old fourteen-men-limit days seems almost a mystery now. Rohe, of Atlanta; Sentell, of Mobile; Breen, of Montgomery; Atz and McIntyre, of New Orleans; Merritt, of Memphis; Carroll, of Birmingham, and Williams, of Chattanooga, have done some yeoman service in the Southern flag chase, even though they don't play in every game. Doubtless, ere this, Bill Schwartz regrets that he tied a can to Summers, his man-of-all-work, as Gealby was injured a day after Summers departed.

COURTNEY ADVISES NEW DATE FOR CREW RACES

ITHACA, N. Y., July 5.—Coach Charles E. Courtney, of Cornell, today, sounded a warning to crews of visiting colleges to hold the Poughkeepsie crew races next year under more favorable tide conditions.

He said that during some of the recent races the tide was against the shells, and for this reason they could not have won.

This was true of the Pennsylvania and Washington four-oared crews, he said.

Thomson Will Face Many Good Rivals

LOS ANGELES, CAL., July 5.—With the entries for the all-around championships, which will be held here on Bovard Field July 12, the outlook for the coming event is exceedingly good. Many coast athletes who could undoubtedly have made good records in all-around championships in years past are taking the opportunity to enter the coming classic and that Fred C. Thomson, the present champion, will have to look for his laurels in the coming event goes without a doubt.

Probably the most serious contenders for the present champion will be Mercer, the phenomenal Quaker, who has startled the Eastern critics with his work of late; Platt Adams, of the New York A. C.; James Donohue, of the L. A. A. C.; Ed Beeson, of California, and Olle Snedigar, the Olympic Club representative. All of these men are first-class performers, better in some events than in others, but can hardly be given credit as such first-class performers as Thomson until they have shown in the all-around tryouts.

This Umpire Won't Stand For a Nickname and Al Bridwell Is the Goat

CHICAGO, July 5.—Al Bridwell, the mild-mannered shortstop of the Cubs, has been canned from a game exactly three times in seven years. Umpire Klem has officiated in all three events.

It happened that Klem and Bridwell were graduated from the same minor league—one as umpire and the other as a player. In this minor league Klem gained his nickname of Catfish. It is said Klem believes Bridwell brought this name up to the majors when he came. So whenever Bridwell is around and starts anything of a quiet character, Klem is reminded of the catfish incident and promptly fires Al.

YANKEES' NEW BALL PARK WILL BE READY IN 1914

NEW YORK, July 5.—Announcement was made to-day by officials of the New York Americans that its new baseball plant would be ready for occupancy when the 1914 season opens. The plant is located on Washington Heights, just a short distance from the old Highland grounds, and will be one of the finest in the country. It will cost over $400,000. The Yankees, homeless this season, are playing at the Polo Grounds.

Dubuc Throws Curves With Three Motions

DETROIT, MICH., July 5.—Jean Dubuc, the French-Canadian pitcher of the Tigers, attributes his success as an American League pitcher to the fact that he can deliver his curves, his slow ball and his fast ball with three different motions and have control of the ball at the same time.

"Years ago, when I was pitching with Notre Dame College, I learned that speed without control was valueless; I always had pretty fair control of my delivery, but with the acquired knowledge I began perfecting different deliveries and gaining control of the ball in each," says Jean.

"It took years of patient effort to acquire the delivery I now have, but I believe it is one of the least trying on the arm and shoulder muscles for the reason that I put the weight of my body behind the pitches and do not depend on the strength of my arm to send up a fast ball.

"I worked with my slow ball for three months before I could get a curve to it, and after that it took me three years to perfect the delivery."

Dubard and Locke Would Star In Any Dixie Field Contests

The upper picture shows Walter Locke, one of Atlanta's star athletes. He is a member of the Athletic Club, and was one of their good point winners in the meet at Piedmont. This picture shows him clearing the bar in the pole vault. He did not win in this event, but copped in the half-mile run. He was second, also, in the quarter-mile dash. Locke has been a star athlete in Atlanta since his early schoolboy days. If he continues to improve he should be heard from in Southern athletic championships.

The lower picture shows Walter Dubard as he sailed through the air in the high jump. Dubard, like Locke, is a member of the Atlanta Athletic Club team, and won his share of points in the Piedmont Park meet. He was a handy winner in the shot put. Dubard has taken a prominent part in athletics here for severl years. He has played football, and is still a basket ball star. With a little training and competition he will develop into one of the star athletes of the South.

LOSS OF GREAT TRIO BREAKS UP PIRATES' TEAM

Retirement of Clarke and Sale of Leach Put Big Hole in the Pittsburg Squad.

CINCINNATI, OHIO, July 5.—For a dozen years the Pittsburg Pirates have served as a pennant contender in the National League and their unexpected slump is the mystery of the 1913 race in the Lynch organization.

What has caused the team picked last winter to fight it out all the way to slip down into the second division has not been analyzed, but according to scribes here with the Corsairs the absence of that famous combination, Clarke-Wagner-Leach, is responsible for the downfall of the Pirates.

Since the day the Louisville and Pittsburg clubs consolidated and the stars of the Colonels—Clarke, Wagner, Leach, Ritchie, Phillippe and others—went to Pittsburg the Smoky Town organization has been right up there each year in the pennant chase.

Queer to See 'Em Down.

To see the Pirates trailing down in the second division is something unusual. For these dozen past years the Pirates have had Clarke, Wagner and Leach. And during the twelve seasons Pittsburg always was one of the main factors in deciding what team would be the pennant winners.

On four occasions the Pirates reigned supreme in the circuit. In 1901, 1902, 1903, the Pirates won the pennant and then in 1909 Clarke with his great combination repeated and topped the season by winning the world's series from the Detroit Tigers.

But now all that remains of the marvelous trio is Honus Wagner. Clarke retired in 1911 and in the middle of last year Barney Dreyfuss put through a trade with the Chicago Cubs which took Leach away.

Breaking up the great trio, Clarke now is trying to rebuild his forces. He is buying all promising recruits but finds it almost impossible to get successors not only for Tommy the Wee, but himself.

When Kitty Bransfield left the Pirates, Skipper Fred had a difficult task locating a competent first sacker and not until he converted Second Baseman "Dots" Miller into a first baseman did he succeed.

And now comes his troubles in developing outfielders to take the place of the positions covered by Leach and himself.

Must Fill Wagner's Place.

Probably when Clarke is lucky and picks up a pair of juvenile stars then he will have to find somebody to relieve that ancient and marvelous Wagner. At present, Honus is in the big arena on his nerve alone. So long as Hans can put on a glove and move about he'll be at short for the Pirates, but the information comes that even the burly Teuton is about ready to retire.

NO BASEBALL FOR EWING; STICKS TO LIFE ON FARM

BELLEFONTAINE, OHIO, July 5. "I can't get away from the farm," is the reply of Bob Ewing, former National League pitcher, to Manager Bade Myers, of the Canton Interstate team, in response to Myers' request that Ewing join his pitching staff. Ewing is living in retirement on a big farm in Auglaize County.

CLABBY AND O'NEIL SIGN ARTICLES FOR HAMMOND GO

HAMMOND, IND., July 5.—Articles have been signed for a ten-round contest between Jimmy Clabby and Tim O'Neil, the Irondale warrior. They are to box at Hammond on July 10. It will be the first meeting between the pair. Clabby is giving away eight or ten pounds in weight.

SEMI-PRO INFIELDER GETS BERTH WITH CLEVELAND

CLEVELAND, OHIO, July 5.—Madison Reinhart, member of the Chicago Grays, has been signed by Manager Birmingham for the Naps. Reinhart is 21 years old and weighs 165 pounds. He had an offer from the Philadelphia Nationals and St. Louis Club, of the Federal League.

TILLIS PLANS SALE OF MONTGOMERY'S FRANCHISE

MONTGOMERY, ALA., July 5.—Richard Tillis, owner of the Montgomery Baseball Association, has been negotiating the sale of the franchise to another city and has requested four Montgomery men who hold an option to release him from the obligation, but they have refused.

Tillis' efforts became known yesterday by announcement of Harry Kahn, one of the persons named in the option. Mr. Kahn said he refused to release Tillis and declared he would hold him to the agreement. Kahn and associates can pay Tillis $15,000 and take over the franchise on or before September 1. When Kahn was given the option Tillis signed a written agreement, which provided that he would keep Montgomery in the Southern League during the season, and if the franchise were sold, it could not be carried away from this city until after the close of the season.

No mention has been made about what city is attempting to purchase the franchise.

M'CARNEY FORSAKES RING FOR COMIC OPERA GAME

SPOKANE, WASH., July 5.—William McCarney, who was manager of Luther McCarty when McCarty died in the ring at Calgary May 24, has made good his statement that he is now in the theatrical business. It is announced that he has closed a contract to become the manager next season of Miss Emma Carus, musical comedy star.

DISPUTE OVER PITCHER HOLM.

OTTAWA, ONT., July 5.—Pitcher Carlo W. Holm, of Montreal, bought from Chicago, is now claimed by Toronto. The National Commission will likely have to decide the case.

ONLY EASTERN TEAMS IN N. L. ARE DRAWING WELL

NEW YORK, July 5.—Figures on the books of the National League show that only the Eastern teams are making money this year, and that if the present rate keeps up the four Western clubs will be big losers.

New York has been the best money-maker so far and has played to great crowds at home. The Phillies have drawn large crowds in their own ballwick and have proven quite a card on the road. For the first time in many years the Dodgers' coffers are bulging, and even the Braves have operated so far at a nice profit.

However, the attendance has greatly fallen off in Chicago, Cincinnati and in Pittsburg. Early in the season the Smoky City fans liberally patronized the park, but since the Pirates began hitting the chutes only the "old guard" has been on hand. In St. Louis the turnstiles are getting rusty from such little use, and this gives promise of being one of the worst years in the Missouri city.

REULBACH TIRED OF CUBS; AFTER BERTH WITH REDS

CINCINNATI, OHIO, July 5.—Ed Reulbach, one of the Cub premiers in the days of pennant winners at Chicago, wants to get away from the Cubs and would like to see President Murphy trade him either to Joe Tinker's Reds or to the Boston Braves. "A change of scenery would do me a lot of good," said Reulbach. "Murphy has treated me all right, but I don't seem able to win for the Cubs."

KLING HELPS REDS.

CINCINNATI, OHIO, July 5.—The value of an experienced catcher is being proved by the Cincinnati team, which, since Johnny Kling has been catching regularly, has been winning a good percentage of its games.

VOLS MUST GET BUSY; TEAM IS SLUMPING FAST

Failure to Secure Ameida and Dodge From Reds Puts Big Hole in Team.

NASHVILLE, TENN., July 5.—Will wonders never cease? The Vols have at last stuck a few plugs in the numerous punctures in their inner wall of defense, by landing a batch of new faces for their line-up. While the bugs were waiting, breathless, for William ("Alibi") Hirsig to round up the cream of the Cincinnati Reds, Bill Schwartz got tired of fooling with his boss and hustled around and annexed Infielder Baumgartner from the Macon Sally Leaguers while the Vols' mogul was editing a story about Tinker sending Third Sacker Granfield to Nashville, after Dodge and Almeida had failed to come.

The poor old Vols have been floundering about since Kitty Gealby had his fin punctured by Dave Robertson's spikes, and the only crumb of comfort in the disaster was the hope that the accident would force Hirsig to shell out for some real ball players.

Granfield a Mystery.

Just as everybody expected, waivers could not be secured on the Cuban Almeida, and Dodge, hitting like a house afire, was too valuable a man for the Reds to turn loose. Hence Mr. Granfield, if one happens to be so affected by the intense heat that one can have faith in Hirsig's statements. Outside of the fact that Granfield is reported to be a third baser, he seems to have no antecedents at all. Where he came from or what his record is is as big a mystery as who hit Billy Patterson.

But Baumgartner, who will relieve Brackenridge, the pitching second-third sacker, comes highly touted in all departments, except in the hit-and-run column, which fact isn't causing anybody to be hilarious over his arrival in camp. There are already too many weak sisters on the team handling the ash, the wretched Vols seldom being able to pry more than five bingles off any twirler's delivery, and at the same time sandwiching in about half as many bobbles as hits, which is about the real reason for their miserable showing at present.

Doak Fails to Report.

Nothing has been heard of Pitcher Doak, the star of the Interstate League, who was to be traded for Charlie Case. But the fault of the lowly Vols' showing isn't all with the slabbers, for Mathewson or Walter Johnson couldn't bring home the bacon did their pals fail to push a tally or two across for them, as is the habit of Hirsig's hired men. They did get Phil Redding from the Cardinals, together with a thousand real dollars, in exchange for big Harry Glenn, who with Akron has been clouting the ball in terrific fashion, and landed Adams, a big right-hander from Savannah, paying $1,500 for the Sally League flinger. None but Hirsig can imagine what he intends to do with all these slabmen. Maybe he intends to trade the entire gang for one real, honest and true batter, who can do more toward lifting the poor old crippled Vols out of the ruck than all the pitchers in the world.

Not a bug in town but sympathizes with Bill Schwartz, who, it is admitted, can do wonders with a bunch of bushers, but it's thumbs down for the boss with the 10-karat alibi who sits calmly by and hopes that somebody will walk up and hand him a perfectly good ball player.

1914 OLYMPIC GAMES WILL BE STAGED AT ATHENS

NEW YORK, July 5.—Next year's special Olympics at Athens, Greece, will be staged on March 25, the same day King Constantine is crowned by his subjects.

With the exception of an aeroplane contest, the same program of events that was put on in 1906 will be duplicated at this meeting. The games and festivities will last until May 5.

It is expected Uncle Sam will be represented by a small team. Only the best material will be sent to fight for the Stars and Stripes in Greece. The 1915 sports at San Francisco follow, and then the Berlin Olympics. The public will be asked to contribute for two of these trips.

AURORA MAY GET FRANCHISE.

AURORA, ILL., July 5.—A majority of the directors of the local baseball association favor going back into the Wisconsin-Illinois League, and it is certain that Aurora will take over Milwaukee's franchise. The directors are expected to formally approve the proposition when they meet Monday night.

TINKER HAS HIGH HOPES.

CINCINNATI, OHIO, July 5.—Joe Tinker denies that he has given up hopes for this season and says he is building his Cincinnati team to run in 1913, not next year, as some have intimated. Tinker is right when he says there are a good many games to be played yet before the pennant is won.

FIFTY YEARS OF ATHLETICS PUTS AMERICA ON TOP

James C. Sullivan Writes on the Value of Exercising for Youths of United States.

By James E. Sullivan.

Secretary-Treasurer of A. A. U. and "Father of Amateur Athletics."

NEARLY half a century has passed since the introduction of amateur track and field sports into this country, and in this long lapse it has frequently been asked what was the real object of those early pioneers of athletics.

It is a question not very difficult to answer. They wanted fresh air and exercise for themselves and to set a good example to the youth of America for after time. I allude to men like the late William B. Curtis, Harry E. Buermeyer and many others, men 50 years in advance of their time, who foresaw the growing need of physical development and outdoor exercise.

Had not the wisdom of these old-timers prevailed, where would America be to-day in amateur athletics, especially with regard to our rating in the Olympic games? Why, we would be worse off than Russia, Denmark or Austria, nations which have not so far produced a first-rate performer either on track or field. We lead the world, and the American athletes have taken the championship in every Olympiad since the first revival in 1896.

Americans Should Improve.

As to future Olympic fixtures, I see no reason why we should not continue to carry off the point honors, for, to my mind, we will continue to grow better from year to year, as the exploration of new districts will surely produce new material. This introduction of new material means everything. An instance of the force of the last statement is that of the State of Utah. Ten years ago if a man had talked of a world's champion coming from Utah he would have been ridiculed, yet at the last Olympic games in Stockholm Almah Richards, of Brigham Young University, Utah, was the hero of the running high jump, and is to-day the greatest natural jumper the world has ever seen.

Athletics a Religion.

For the boys athletics has simply instituted an eighth-day religion, as it were. It has taught him that in order to be a success in either track or field he must be good, morally and physically.

To participate in school sports nowadays the boy is impressed with the idea that he must first of all observe the rules of the sport, and that under no circumstances can he use abusive language to his superior or to another boy. Should the boy be guilty of any of these things there is always a referee at hand to discipline him and point out the error without being harsh or unduly severe.

The honesty of competition is also brought home to the youth. If he cuts the course, shoulders another boy, does not touch off in a relay, he suffers a just disqualification, and thus it is shown to him, in the most convincing manner that, after all, honesty is the best policy.

CARNEY PUTS IN FIRST CHALLENGE TO PLAY DE ORO

ST. LOUIS, MO., July 5.—The next match for the world's three-cushion championship will be played between Alfredo DeOro and Joe Carney. Frank Benson, the local billiard impresario, received word Friday morning that Carney, the Denver cueist, had placed his challenge ahead of all other performers, and would meet DeOro when the fall season starts in September.

It was thought that John Horgan would attempt to regain his laurels ahead of anybody else, after losing to the Cuban out in San Francisco last April, but "Banker Jawn" now will have to wait until Carney and DeOro play.

Carney was the carom expert who surprised the billiard world by defeating DeOro about a year and a half ago. Had DeOro won that match he would have secured possession of the diamond trophy. Carney's first match as champion was with Horgan, and the Sixth Street idol won with ease.

CLASSIC CITY EXTENDS ARMS TO TRAVELERS

Atlanta Autoists Assured of Good Roads on Athens Tirp—Historic and Commercial Center.

ATHENS, GA., July 5.—The automobile log of the local Chamber of Commerce, showing turns and dips in the road from Atlanta to Athens, is complete, and is at the disposal of Atlantans who contemplate week-end trips to the Classic City and of Athenians who desire to spend Saturday and Sunday in the Gate City. The log was made up this week by Andrew C. Erwin, president of the Athens Chamber of Commerce; Martin J. Abney, vice president; C. D. Heidler, director, and C. C. Callaway, secretary, who toured to Atlanta and back to Athens.

The trip out was through Winder, Duluth, Norcross and Buckhead, and back through Decatur, Stone Mountain, Snellville and Monroe, with logging the entire way. The party reported unusually good roads most of the way, with convict gangs working out the bad places in Clarke, Oconee, Jackson, Gwinnett, DeKalb and Fulton Counties. Clarke County claims to have the best roads in the State, but the Chamber of Commerce scouts were free to admit that the highways of Fulton and DeKalb were unusually good on the average.

Atlantans Going on Trips.

For quite a while Atlanta people and Athens people have been exchanging visits by way of the automobile routes between the two cities. Young couples frequently come to Georgia-Tech athletic contests by the use of the automobile and go back the same day, a total distance of 150 miles. Similarly, well-to-do Athenians are accustomed to tour through the country to Atlanta to visit friends and relatives.

Now all this visiting will be much more simple, and the local Chamber of Commerce has made it so. Amateur automobilists need not lose their way and people to whom the trip is not new can get valuable pointers on various turns in the road and the general condition of the same.

The chamber's information is contained in a handsome booklet that is being distributed. The information will be supplied alike to individuals and to touring bureaus. Trips can be made in about four hours' easy sailing.

Historic Charm of Athens.

Athens is one of the oldest cities in the State, the home during college days of hundreds of history-making Georgians, a section where the intellectual and social spirit finds unique expression. Situated on the banks of the Oconee River and on the undulating stretches which slough off from the Blue Ridge mountain chain, it has inspired many a university poet to sing. Its hospitality is famed throughout the State, and its social conventions have weathered most of the industrial storms.

Apart from sentiment, however, Athens is noted for its steady commercial progress. Once considered a town which grew up around the State University, it is now regarded as quite an entity. Civic activities and academic activities are not out of harmony, yet the two operate more independently now than ever before. The growth of Athens in population and in public buildings and fine commercial spirit has excited general admiration. About six years ago Athens' first office building was erected, and since then the city's business leaders have been busy making two grow where but one grew before.

LAST LINK DONE IN BIG HIGHWAY

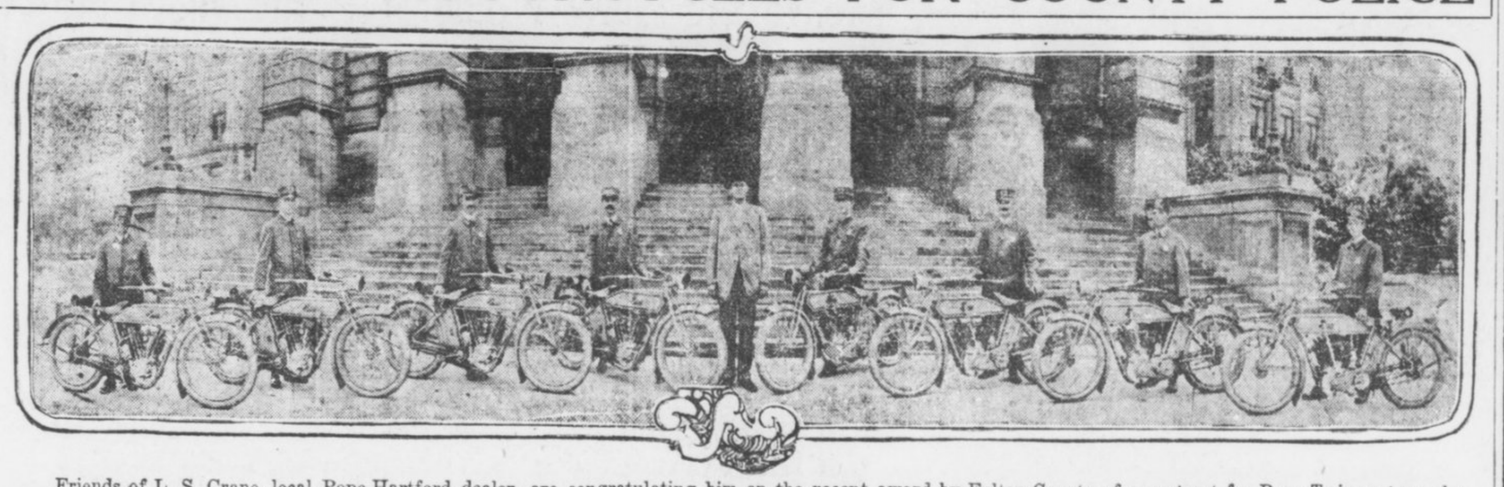
No More Bogs Between Atlanta and Jacksonville After Next Week—Good Work Done.

VALDOSTA, GA., July 5.—Before the end of next week the highway from Atlanta to Jacksonville will be completed and the only bad place in the road will be repaired. It is a strip of two miles through the edge of Brooks County, between Lowndes and Madison, which the Commissioners of Brooks County refused to work because the road was not important to that county.

The business men of Valdosta put up the money to build a splendid highway through this strip of territory, and a large force of hands have been working on it for the past month under the direction of former County Commissioner Coffee.

Every day since the work was started large delegations have gone from this city to look after the work and to enjoy fish fries which Superintendent Coffee has been giving to the visitors on the banks of the river.

POPE TWIN MOTORCYCLES FOR COUNTY POLICE



Friends of L. S. Crane, local Pope-Hartford dealer, are congratulating him on the recent award by Fulton County of a contract for Pope Twin motorcycles for the county police force. The police are on either side of Chief Zach Rowan, who is the only member who does not go out regularly for fast spins such as this machine affords. The picture was taken on the steps of the State Capitol. Very few, if any automobilists, declare the county men, can outdistance them.

G. W. HANSON WITH OAKLAND; LOCAL BRANCH DISCONTINUED

Announcement of Much Interest in Automobile Circles Following Recent Change—Direct Factory Distributor.

He will be direct factory distributor of Oakland cars in the entire Southeastern States.

The local Oakland branch will be discontinued, and the Hanson interests, with headquarters in Atlanta, will become probably the largest distributing point for automobiles in the South.

This extraordinary announcement is of interest to the automobile fraternity of almost the entire Eastern section of the United States.

Factories, dealers and branch houses, owners and buyers of automobiles have been wondering just what line George Hanson would represent in the future, and here's the answer.

While it has been known that "G. W." has had numerous offers from different factories since severing his connection with the Studebakers, the announcement of his contract with the Oakland Company comes as a distinct surprise. The Oakland was evidently the dark horse in the running for Mr. Hanson's services, and the very car that no one had figured upon was the one that ran truest to form, in Mr. Hanson's judgment.

Mr. Hanson's Surprise.

"No one was more surprised than myself," said he. "I had no idea of what the Oakland was, and I had no idea that I could make a satisfactory connection with the Oakland Company until I went to Pontiac.

"Several of my friends in Detroit boosted the car and the company so much to me that it aroused my curiosity, and, like Caesar, I went to see. Once at the factory, I saw why my friends boosted the Oakland line of cars. I saw that they were designed right and built right, of the right material.

"When I met President Daniels and Sales Manager Eggleston, I understood why my friends had boosted the Oakland organization. They are great, big, broad-minded, loyal, energetic, wide-awake men, who understand human nature and are filled with the ambition to do big things in a big, honest manner. Men heading an organization of wholesome, live workers, whose every step is bent toward building a good car and building that car right and at the right price.

"That is all there is to it. I went, I saw, and I was conquered. That is, I was conquered by these cars and these men, and now am a regular on the firing line of the Oakland forces.

"I want to say to my friends throughout the South that I will maintain a distributing point in Atlanta that will eclipse anything ever heretofore attempted. The agency will be operated upon the same lines and the same policy as a factory branch."

Is a "Live Wire."

Than George Hanson there is probably no more able automobile man in the country. Square, honest, affable and pleasant at all times, he has made a host of business and personal friends throughout the South. He is always thorough in his business dealings, quick to seize an opportunity, a great booster and an all-around good fellow.

He came to Atlanta in the early days of the automobile game and secured the agency for the E. M. F. car. His "Old Bullet," the first E. M. F. shipped South of the Virginia line, is well remembered for its feats and records. He built up a selling organization in the Southern territory that was second to none. His entire force of workers loved him and he loved them.

When the South came into the limelight in automobile circles through the untiring efforts of Mr. Hanson and men like him, the E. M. F. Company established a factory branch in Atlanta and would listen to no other name for its manager than George Hanson. He accepted upon his own terms and kept up the great work started with the agency.

Success Is Predicted.

When the Studebakers purchased the E. M. F. factories, they retained Hanson as manager and he has remained in that capacity until a few weeks ago, when he left his positon with a view toward going back into business for himself.

That he will be successful in his new undertaking goes without saying. The Oakland line is already favorably known to Atlanta and the South and Mr. Hanson is expected to make it better and better known and more and more popular.

It is rumored that the Hanson interests will within a short time control other valuable automobile lines in connection with the Oakland. The offices for the present will be located at 26 James Street.

JOHN G. MONIHAN IS NOW WITH COLE

Former Premier Business Getter in New Position—To Be Associate Sales Director.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., July 5.—John Guy Monihan, of the Premier Motor Manufacturing Company, has become associate director of sales and advertising of the Cole Motor Car Company. This is in accordance with the plans for expansion worked out by Homer McKee, director of sales and advertising, at the suggestion of President J. J. Cole. Under the same plan, Ed F. Harris, whose work in the sales department of the Cole justifies his advancement, has been promoted to field sales manager. This expansion in organization follows closely on the recent announcement of increasing the Cole stock to $1,000,000, the doubling of output and the closing of a contract for another mammoth addition to the factory on East Washington Street.

Mr. McKee will still wield the balance of power as director of sales and advertising. He will see that the sales department co-operates with the advertising department and vice versa. In other words, he will have the task of seeing that every ounce of energy of the advertising department is delivered to the sales department and the sales department does likewise for the advertising department.

Mr. Monihan has been in the automobile business for the last five years. His most recent automobile experience has been with Premier, closely associated with President H. O. Smith and R. W. Macey. With his co-operation Premier business has steadily increased. At all times an enthusiast, his views are of the return getting variety. Monihan originated the amateur transcontinental ocean-to-ocean tour in 1911, which is to-day part of American automobile history. His personality has won for him lasting friends from coast to coast. As a sales lecturer he has won a name. He has written several books. He is a member of the Red Roosters, Pen and Pencil Club of Philadelphia, the Columbus Club of this city and other organizations.

LUNCH BASKET TOURS CATCH MOTOR GIRLS

By EVELYN WREN.

At last Atlanta motor girls have learned one of the cardinal principles of ultimate success in automobile life. I mean a new way of preparing edibles in a truly "jumped-up" fashion so that no matter how far away from the kitchen and the grocery store, or how keen the appetite, the motor girl can survive the crisis.

How does she do it? The answer is easy. She has begun to carry along with her on tiresome trips these hot summer months modern lunch baskets for automobile use, and she sets before herself and her fortunate companions the most toothsome edibles that dainty fingers can devise. Open-air luncheons and suppers are accordingly having quite a vogue. Why, it is frequently asked, should the motor girl hasten back to the town house for dinner or supper in broiling hot sun, when she can carry along a lunch basket, enjoy a meal from it and return home in the cool of twilight?

Milady's Beauty Preserved.

For short trips, and long ones, too, if supplemented by bad weather garments, the woman who motors may now buy dustcoats so light and sheer as to defy even the most ambitiously climbing mercury. These are of mohair and of silk. Some may be had in dun color, that ignore the stains of travel, for $38.50. Others, with wide kimono sleeves, bring $25. By holding them up to the light one may look through them quite easily, and they have a delightfully cool "feel." But the material is so woven and of such a texture that it will shed dust with remarkable facility and bring you in at the end of the run looking quite as fresh, as to dainty waist or lingerie dress, as you were at the beginning.

A new and chic bit of headgear for the summer motoring is a little cap-like bonnet of crocheted straw, with an open mesh like a very coarse lace. This is lined with silk to match the shade of the exterior, which comes in many hues. These hats fetch $2.25 and weigh practically nothing.

Try this recipe for a jolly tour, girls, when you are sure "father" has had a good year in business.

GASOLINE TOUR BREAKS RECORD

S. G. Averill Drives Franklin 68.6 Miles on Gallon—Fluid Lasts5 1-2 Hours.

All automobile economy records were shattered by S. G. Averell, of New York, when he drove a Franklin car 86.6 miles on one gallon of gasoline Friday, June 20, on Long Island. The test was made under the auspices of the Automobile Club of America.

It was made to show what is possible in the way of mileage of an automobile on a given quantity of fuel. The result was the most remarkable record ever made by an automobile, far exceeding anything yet accomplished in the way of economy operation. The car covered 86.6 miles before it finally came to a stop, practically doubling the former world's gasoline economy record of 46.1 miles, also made by a Franklin.

Owner Drives Car.

The car was driven by its owner, S. G. Averell, who was accompanied by Herbert E. Chase, laboratory chief of the Automobile Club of America, under whose direct supervision the test was made. The car was a four-cylinder Franklin of eighteen horsepower.

With its two passengers the car weighed 1,955 pounds, or a little less than a ton. The result, therefore, showed efficiency of 86 ton miles a gallon, which has never been approached, even by a motor truck, under the most favorable circumstances. The gasoline was furnished by the Automobile Club of America.

Long Island Route.

Starting on Queens Boulevard, Long Island, after the gasoline tank had been emptied and the official gallon put in, the run led through Jamaica, Mineola and Hicksville to the Merrick Road at Massapequa. The same ruote was then followed back. No one on the run believed that 60 miles would be exceeded, but this mileage brought the car nearly back to the starting point, and it showed no signs of stopping.

On it went toward Flushing, back and down to the island for several miles, back to the Queensboro Bridge and then still farther on the Flushing route, returning toward the starting point and climbing the hill on the boulevard before finally coming to a halt with the speedometer reading 86.6 miles. It had taken more than five hours and a half to use up a single gallon of fuel at an average speed of 15 3-4 miles an hour.

Mr. Averell did as much coasting as the nature of the country would permit, but the up grades made up for the down. Some traffic stops and rough road surfaces added to the difficulties of the test, especially toward the end. The car stopped within 500 feet of where it started out.

Old Home-Sites Pass In Realty Transfer

NEW YORK, July 5.—Work has begun tearing down the row of old private houses on the Madison Avenue block front, on the west side, between Thirty-fourth and Thirty-fifth Streets, for the addition to the Altman store. Mr. Altman acquired the property from the Astor estate and others only a year ago.

The Thirty-fourth Street corner house, long occupied as a fashionable dressmaking establishment, was for many years the home of F. H. Delano, and the big double house at 194 Madison Avenue was the old home of John V. Chanler, both of whom were connected by marriage with the Astor family. Lawrence Turnure once lived at 192, and at 198, being the Thirty-fifth Street corner house, Cornelius Bliss resided.

The Altman store addition on this frontage will be twelve stories high, and it will harmonize architecturally with the main eight-story building, covering the remainder of the large block to Fifth Avenue.

THIS LAND IS VALUABLE.

A piece of land two miles wide and six miles long, in the neighborhood of Central Park West, in New York City, is worth more than the total land value of the State of Missouri.

S. A. E. Engineers At Goodyear Plant

A number of the party of English engineers and members of the S. A. E., made a side trip from Cleveland to Akron recently to visit the Goodyear tire factory.

The thing that struck the English visitors most during the visit was the idea of specialization that is being developed in American tire factories.

"Several years ago America looked to Europe for ideas, not only in the structural tendencies of foreign motor cars, but also for tire designing," said E. R. Hall, chief of experimental department, and one of the Goodyear representatives to the S. A. E. "But now the tables are changed. It is safe to say that America is several years ahead. In this country we have special tires made from different classes of work, special tires for electrics and gasoline cars, special tires for trucks. Tires are being built more for the particular work they must do than formerly."

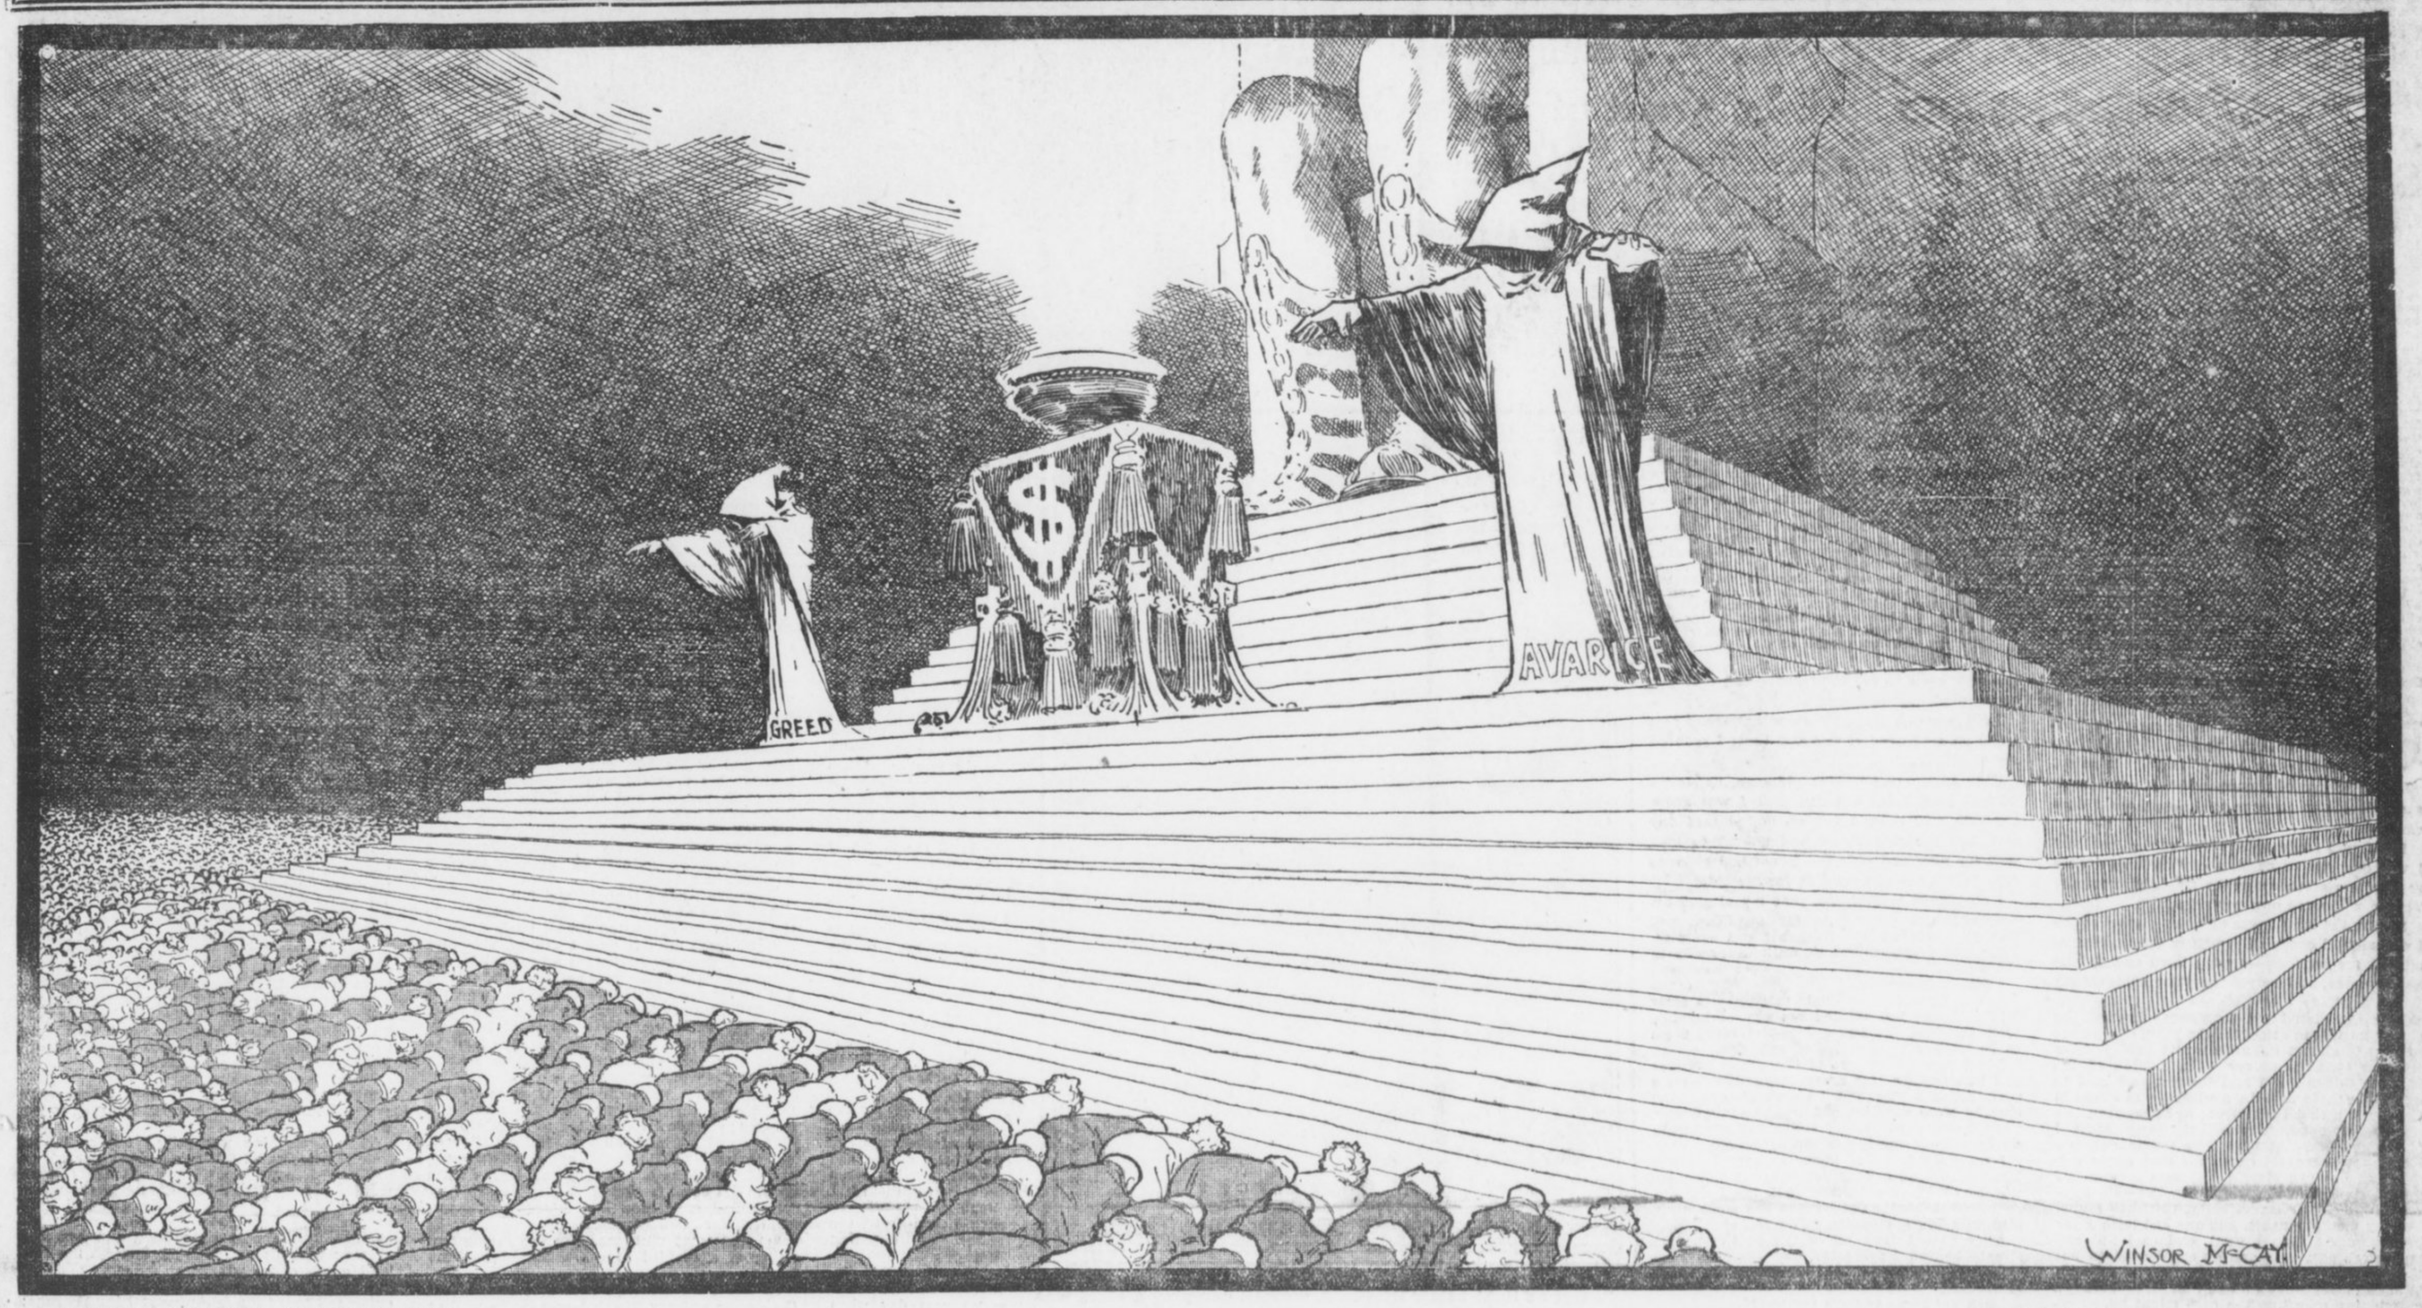
THE MYSTERIOUS MONEY GOD



Copyright, 1913, by the Star Company. Great Britain Rights Reserved.

GREED AND AVARICE Are His Two High Priests, and All Men Worship the God.
Men Worship Money, Yet Know Nothing About It.
Money and Electricity Are the Two Mysteries. This Much, However, We Know: That the Government Must Control the Money God and Lend Its Power Direct to the People.

MEN use electricity for almost everything — for sweeping, for washing, for lights, for phonographs, for cooking, for heating, for transportation; and they don't know what electricity is, and they don't understand its workings.

Only a few days since a great electrical expert, testifying in a patent suit, explained that a certain electrical machine did certain things to the Hertzian waves. He didn't really know how the machine did it or what went on inside of the machine. And he might have added that neither he nor anybody else living knows what the Hertzian wave really is or anything fundamental about electricity.

We explain our ignorance concerning electric power by saying that we have conquered electricity only recently and haven't had time to get acquainted with it.

But what about money?

We have been using money for many a dreary century. We have worked for it, begged for it, bargained for it, fought for it, married and murdered to get it—AND STILL WE KNOW NOTHING ABOUT MONEY.

We have used as "money" slaves, shells, the skins of beasts, from which comes the word "pecuniary"; we have used wampum and gold, silver and copra—everything that men hold valuable they have used as a token of value, or as "money," and we don't know anything really about money to-day.

This greatest country in the world is trying to rearrange its "financial system," and all the doctors of finance and all the lawmakers and business men are just as ignorant concerning the great trade problem as were the first savages that ever exchanged a shining seashell for a dead fish.

One financial man says that the Government must have a great bank and run the country's finances, and another says that such a system would mean destruction, centralization of financial power and tyranny.

Andrew Jackson, the great Democrat, is praised because he smashed the great central bank. They told him that that bank was entitled to a certain representation in Congress, and he said, "By the Eternal," that if anything in the country could compete with the Government in that way he would kill it—and he did kill it.

Now the descendants of his own Democratic party are proposing a banking scheme which gets as near to a central Government bank as it dares to get.

The managers are to be chosen in part by the owners of private capital and in part by the Government of the United States.

And private capital is to make five per cent profit—which, by the way, does not tempt private capital at all, for AMERICAN private capital is a pretty hungry capital and is used to rich food.

The fathers of this new system praise it; the beneficiaries of the old system curse it. Stocks first hop up, then fall down; the people, as a whole, do not know what it is all about, and the capitalists and the lawmakers know just as little as the people.

About the actual inside workings of money we know as little as we do about the nature of electricity.

But with money, as with electricity, we can watch EFFECTS PRODUCED; we can know where the power is and apply it where it is needed.

We know about money that the lack of it is a curse preventing development. And an oversupply of it, artificially made, is a worse curse, causing paralysis and panic.

And timidity in the minds of money owners, however inspired, causes hoarding and chills the business world.

We know that money is to commerce, industry and manufactures and to material development what water is to the crops and knowledge to the mind.

We know that the world of finance is the feeding ground of the most cunning, useless and pitiless sharks that the human race develops, from the pawnbroker who charges a sick mother twenty-five per cent for a loan on her baby's clothing, to the eminently respectable banking firm that charges a sick railroad in such a fashion as to put it in bankruptcy.

We know that we have in this country more than twenty thousand different bankers, every one of them a middleman PRODUCING nothing.

Every bank means that there is a president of a bank, an intelligent man, who spends his days shaving notes, PRODUCING nothing.

A cashier and assistant cashier, a vice-president perhaps, tellers of different kinds, are all NON-PRODUCERS.

The farmers who do produce wealth and create it pay an average of eight per cent for the money they borrow—which is criminal usury.

And business men are bled most severely when their needs are greatest.

And when money is needed to move the crops it cannot be had in sufficient amounts, although it is lying idle, piled up in vaults.

And our stupid banking system compels every bank to keep stored away, UNUSED, a great part of its golden machinery that ought to be at work—which means that hundreds of millions lie idle all the time. A system compelling a farmer to keep in his barn three mules doing nothing, for six mules on the road, would be no more stupid than our bank reserve system.

The new system, the new financial egg which is laid by the Democratic hen, is a complicated attempt to solve the unsolvable, a feeble sort of an effort to check the hopeless private bank system, combined with the equally foolish effort to lift one's self by the boot straps.

The banks are to loan money on what is called good security. And that good security is the banks' assets. And the banks' assets are chiefly WHAT PEOPLE OWE THE BANKS.

Therefore, we call it the public debt, an asset, and loan money on DEBT, instead of calling actual property an asset and loaning money on actual property.

What is going to be done in the long run? "Nor you, nor I, nor nobody knows," as the children used to sing.

But this much is certain:

A WAY WILL BE FOUND IN THE END TO ENABLE THE GOVERNMENT TO LOAN DIRECTLY TO THE CITIZENS, NOT LENDING TO THEM, THROUGH BANKS, ON THEIR DEBTS, BUT DIRECT ON THEIR PROPERTY.

The Government is destined to be more and more a central pool of wealth, toward which the country's money will flow, and from which it must be pumped back again into the pockets of the people.

The parcels post, which will be intelligently and usefully developed eventually, will pour its tens and hundreds of millions annually into the Government pocketbook, giving to the Government all the vast revenues that the private express companies have collected—and more.

And the postal banking system, which will also be popularly developed in such a way as to make the total deposits amount to hundreds of millions, will put vast capital in Government hands.

Before any of us are very much older Government ownership of public monopolies (railroads, telegraphs, and telephones especially) will bring other hundreds of millions into the national golden pool—and all that must be pumped out again and scattered wisely, just as water that keeps running back to the ocean is taken up by the sun's rays and scattered in clouds and dropped upon the soil again.

The Government to-day scatters its money in this way:

It gives the money to private bankers, estimable gentlemen individually, but polite and "legal" usurers in reality.

The banker owns a Government bond, upon which the Government pays him three or four per cent. And against this bond which pays him interest the Government permits him to issue currency which is REAL MONEY. And the banker loans this currency to the business man for five or six per cent, and to the farmer for eight or ten or twelve per cent, so that he gets three or four per cent from the Government on his own money invested in bonds, and at the same time he gets from the Government the right to duplicate the bonds in the shape of currency and to loan it out at usurious rates to the public.

It may not be possible for the mind of man to understand money and its meaning. But the mind of man, which is not able to understand electricity, is at least able to USE it intelligently.

And man will eventually use money intelligently, and the people will borrow from the Government (that is to say, from themselves direct) at a fair rate of interest, and get away from the system of twenty-odd thousand bankers, each one personally a very honest, estimable bloodsucker, getting all the interest and profit possible in times of prosperity, and first to yell murder and shut his front door in times of panic.

We don't know anything about electricity, but we know how to get it out of Niagara Falls and send it where it is needed.

We don't know anything about money. But we OUGHT to know enough to get it out of the central pool of credit and gold, which is the Government, and send it where it is needed.

"The Woman Thou Gavest Me" Faces Her Great Crisis

Hall Caine's Serial Masterpiece in the July Issue of HEARST'S MAGAZINE Tells Vividly How "Mary O'Neill," Friendless and Half-Ignorant of Life's Greatest Mystery, Went Through the Ordeal of Motherhood.

I asked the old driver how long it would take me to get to Ilford. He looked at me again and said, "'Bout 'our and a 'alf I should say by the looks of you—and you a-carryin' the biby."

SYNOPSIS: Daniel O'Neill, a powerful, self-made man, forces his only daughter, Mary, into a loveless marriage with the impecunious and profligate Lord Raa, so that his ambition to have his descendants the rightful heirs of the one earldom in Ellan may be realized. Mary, a convent-raised young woman, shocked to find her husband a man of sordid, sensual passions, refuses utterly to have anything to do with him until such time as he can prove himself worthy of her love. During the honeymoon abroad Alma Lier, a divorcee who had been expelled from the convent Mary attended in Rome, attaches herself to the party, and makes the "honeymoon trip" a long series of slights and insults for Lady Raa.

At last Lady Raa becomes certain of the infidelity of her husband and of his misconduct with Alma Lier. On her return to London Mary encounters her old playfellow, Martin Conrad, who has returned from his triumphant expedition to the Antarctic. Drawn into ever-closer relations with the only man for whose friendship she had ever cared, Mary finally awakes to the fact that she is hopelessly in love with Martin. Terrified by this knowledge and finding herself more and more in love with Martin, she determines to run away from the cause of her distress, and go home.

Mary's homecoming to Castle Raa is a sad affair. Her husband fills the tumbledown old mansion with his fast friends from London, including Alma Lier, who assumes control of the household. Ultimately the illness of her father offers Mary excuse for escape from the intolerable environment. But before visiting her old home Mary appeals in turn to her bishop and to her father's lawyer, only to be told that neither Church nor State can offer any relief from her false position. She returns next day to Castle Raa to find that Martin is arriving for a farewell visit, and that by Alma Lier's deceitful scheming the whole house party has gone off for a few days' cruise.

During her three days alone with her lover Mary fights a grim battle with temptation, only to find on the last night that her faith in renunciation and the laws of the Church is a fragile thing compared with her overwhelming love for this pure-hearted man. With Martin's passionate words, "You are my real wife. I am your real husband," ringing in her brain she forgets everything else, and with strong steps walks across the corridor to Martin's bedroom. This is the action which Martin has advised as being the only course open to them which is sure to bring the one result they are determined to attain—Mary's divorce from Lord Raa.

Mary determines, after the departure of Martin Conrad, to hide herself in London. She is driven by fear of Lord Raa's discovery of her unfaithfulness to him; she is equally afraid of the venomous tongue of Alma Lier. She is no sooner settled in a cheap little boarding house in London than a great hue and cry is raised by her father. Of all persons, it is Mildred, that one truest friend of her convent days, who ferrets her out; but for Mary's sake she breaks a vow and refuses to give her up. Then comes the report of the loss of Martin's ship in the Antarctic. Desperate with grief and fearful for the unborn child which she hopes shall reconcile her to her empty life and typify her great love for Martin, she flees from Mildred to a still more obscure corner of London.

FINDING it necessary to account for myself, just as at the boarding house, I had adhered to my former name, but said I was the widow of a commander lately lost at sea, which was as near to the truth as I dare venture.

I had also made no disguise of the fact that I was expecting a child, a circumstance which secured me much sympathy from the womanly women who were now my neighbors.

During the long hours of every day in which I was alone I occupied myself in the making of clothes for my baby—buying linen and flannel and worsted, and borrowing patterns from my Welsh landlady.

This stimulated my tenderness toward the child that was to come, for the heart of a young mother is almost infantile, and I hardly know whether to laugh or cry when I think of the childish things I did and thought and said to myself in those first days when I was alone in my room in that back street in Bayswater.

Thus long before the baby was born I christened her. At first I wished to call her Mary, not because I cared for that name myself, but because Martin had said it was the most beautiful in the world. In the end, however, I called her Isabel Mary, (because Isabel was my mother's name, and she had been a far better woman than I was), and as I finished my baby's garments one by one I used to put them away in their drawer, saying to myself: "That's Isabel Mary's binder," or "Isabel Mary's christening robe," as the case might be.

I dare say it was all very foolish. There are tears in my eyes when I think of it now, but there were none then, for though there were moments when, thinking of Martin, I felt as if life were for ever blank and bare, I was almost happy in my poor surroundings, and if it were a cage I had fixed myself in there was always a bird singing inside of it—the bird that sang in my own bosom.

"When Isabel Mary comes everything will be all right," I used to think.

But what about the child itself?

A being born out of the pale of the law, as my husband would say it must be, an outcast, a thing of shame, without a father to recognize it, and with its mother's sin to lash its back for ever!

When I thought of that, much as I had longed for the child that was to be a living link between Martin and me, I asked myself if I had any right to wish for it.

I felt I had no right, and that considering my helpless position, the only true motherly love was to pray that my baby might be still-born.

But that was too hard. It was too terrible. It was like a second bereavement. I could not and would not do it.

"Never never, never!" I told myself.

Thinking matters out, I concuded that poverty was at the root of nearly everything. If I could stave off poverty no real harm could come to my child.

I determined to do so. But there was only one way open to me at present—and that was to retrench my expenses.

I did retrench them. Persuading myself that I had no real need of this and that; I reduced my weekly outlay.

This gave me immense pleasure, and even when I saw, after a while, that I was growing thin and pale, I felt no self-pity of any sort, remembering that I had nobody to look well for now and only the sweet and glorious duty before me of providing for my child.

I convinced myself, too, that my altered appearance was natural to my condition, and that all I needed was fresh air and exercise. Therefore I determined to walk every day in the Park.

I did so once only.

It was one of those lovely mornings in early Spring, when the air and the sky of London, after the long fog and grime of Winter, seem to be washed by showers of sunshine.

I had entered by one of the broad avenues and was resting (for I was rather tired) on a seat, under a chestnut tree whose glistening sheaths were swelling and breaking into flower, when I saw a number of ladies and gentlemen on horseback coming in my direction.

I recognized one of them instantly. It was Mr. Vivian, and a beautiful girl was riding beside him. My heart stood still, for I thought he would see me. But he was too much occupied with his companion to do so.

After that I took my walks in the poorer streets behind Baychester.

Later I was forced to discontinue my walks altogether.

Then my room became my world.

I do not think I ever saw a newspaper. And knowing nothing of what was going on, beyond the surge and swell of the life of London as it came to me when I opened my window, I had now, more than ever, the sense of living in a dungeon on a rock in the middle of the sea.

Having no exercise, I ate less and less. But I found a certain joy in that, for I was becoming a miser for my child's sake, and the only pain I suffered was when I went to my drawer, as I did every day, and looked at my rapidly diminishing store.

I knew that my Welsh landlady was beginning to call me close, meaning mean, but that did not trouble me in the least, because I told myself that every penny I saved out of my own expenses was for my child, to keep her from poverty and all the evils and injustices that followed in its train.

But I made no arrangements for myself until my Welsh landlady came up to my room one day and asked if I had settled with a doctor. When I answered no, she held up her hands and cried, "Good gracious! Just as I thought. Thee'st got to lose no time, though."

Happily there was a doctor in our street nearly every day, and if I wished it she would call him up to me. I agreed and the doctor came next morning.

He was a tall, elderly man with cold eyes, compressed lips and a sour expression ,and neither his manner nor his speech gave any hint of a consciousness (which I am sure every doctor must have) that in coming to a woman in my condition he was entering one of the sacred chambers of human life.

He asked me a few abrupt questions, told me when he would come again, and then spoke about his fee.

"My fee is a guinea, and I usually get it in advance," he said, whereupon I went to my drawer, and took out a sovereign and shilling, not without a certain pang at seeing so much go in a moment after I had been saving so long.

The doctor had dropped the money into his waistcoat pocket with oh, such a casual air, and was turning to go, when my Welsh landlady said, "Her's not doing herself justice in the matter of food, doctor."

"Why, what do you eat?" asked the doctor, and as well as I could out of my dry and parched throat, I told him.

"Tut! tut! This will never do," he said. "It's your duty to your child to have better food than that. Something light and nourishing every day, such as poultry, fish, chicken-broth, beef-tea, and farinaceous foods generally."

I gasped. What was the doctor thinking about?

"I felt as light as air itself. A woman carrying a child was like a queen—everybody made way for her, and it seemed to me as if the wealth of the world were in my arms."

"Remember," he said, with his finger-tip, "the health of the child is intimately dependent on the health of the mother. When the mother is in a morbid state it affects the composition of the blood, and does great harm to the health of the offspring, both immediately and in after life. Don't forget now. Good-day!"

That was a terrible shock to me. In my great ignorance and great love I had been depriving myself for the sake of my child, and now I learned that I had all the time been doing it a grave and perhaps lifelong injury!

Trying to make amends, I sent out for some of the expensive foods the doctor had ordered me, but when they were cooked I found to my dismay that I had lost the power of digesting them.

My pain at this discovery was not lessened next day when my Welsh landlady brought up a nurse whom I had asked her to engage for me. She was what the doctors call a croaker, began on a long series of stories of ladies who, having "let themselves down" had died, either at childbirth or soon afterward.

"It's after a lady feels it if she has to nurse her baby," said the nurse, "and I couldn't be responsible neither for you nor the child if you don't do yourself justice."

This was a still more terrible possibility—the possibility that I might die and leave my child behind me.

The thought of leaving my baby behind now terrified and appalled me. It brought me no comfort to think that though I was poor my father was rich, for I knew that if he ever came to know of my child's existence he would hate it and cast it off, as the central cause of the downfall of his plans.

Yet Martin's child alone, and at the mercy of the world! It could not and must not be!

I thought of how Martin had been taken from me, as fate (perhaps for some good purpose still unrevealed) had led me to believe.

I thought of how I had comforted myself with the hope of the child that was coming to be a link between us.

I thought of how this had taken the sting out of death and victory out of the grave.

And after that I told myself that, however sweet and beautiful, all this had been selfishness, and I must put it away.

Then I thought of the child itself, who—conceived in sin as my Church would say, disinherited by the law, outlawed by society, inheriting my physical weaknesses, having lost one of its parents and being liable to lose the other—was now in danger of being left to the mercies of the world, banned from its birth, penniless and without protector, to become a drudge and an outcast or even a thief, a gambler, or a harlot.

This was what I thought and felt.

And when at last I knew that I had come to the end of my appointed time I knelt down in my sad room, and if ever I prayed a fervent prayer, if ever my soul went up to God in passionate supplications it was that the child I had longed for and looked forward to as a living link with my lost one might be born dead.

It was Saturday, the twenty-first of June. The Summer had been a cold one thus far; the night was chill and heavy, rain was beating against the window pane.

There was a warm fire in my room for the first time for several months; the single gas jet on the window side of the mantelpiece had been turned low, and the nurse in light slippers, was taking my little flannel and linen garments out of the chest of drawers and laying them on the flat steel fender.

I think I must have had intervals of insensibility, for the moments of consciousness came and went with me, like the diving and rising of a seabird in the midst of swelling waves.

At one such moment I became aware that the doctor and my Welsh landlady, as well as my nurse, were in the room, and that they were waiting for the crisis and fearing for my life.

I heard them talking in low voices which made a drumming noise in my ears, like that which the sea makes when it is rolling into a cave.

"She's let herself down so low, pore thing, that I don't know in the world what's to happen to her."

"As God is my witness, look you, I never saw anybody live on so little."

"I'm not afraid of the mother. I'm more afraid of the child, if you ask me."

Then the drumming noise would die out, and I would only hear something within myself saying:

"Oh, God, oh, God, that my child may be born dead."

At another moment I heard, above the rattle of the rain, the creaking of the mangle in the cellar kitchen on the other side of the street.

At still another moment I heard the sound of quarrelling in the house opposite. A woman was screaming, children were shrieking, and a man was swearing in a thick, hoarse voice.

I knew what had happened—it was midnight, the "public houses had turned out," and Mr. Wagstaffe had come home drunk.

The night passed heavily. I heard myself (as I had done before) calling on Martin in a voice of wild entreaty: "Martin! Martin!"

Then remembering that he was gone I began again to pray. I heard myself praying to the Blessed Vrgin: "Oh, Mother of my God, let my child"——

But a voice which seemed to come from far away interrupted me.

"Hush, bach, hush! It will make it harder for thee."

At length peace came. It seemed to me that I was running out of a tempestuous sea, with its limitless loneliness and cruel depth, into a quiet harbor.

There was a heavenly calm, in which I could hear the doctor and the nurse and my Welsh landlady talking together in cheerful whispers.

I knew that everything was over, and with the memory of the storm I had passed through still in my heart and brain, I said: "Is it dead?"

"Dead?" cried the nurse in a voice several octaves higher than usual. "Dear heart no, but alive and well. A beautiful little daughter!"

"Yes, your baby is all right, ma'am," said the doctor, and then my Welsh landlady cried: "Why did'st think it would be dead, bach? As I am a Christian woman thee'st got the beautifullest baby that ever breathed."

I could bear no more.

The dark thoughts of the days before were over me still, and with a groan I turned to the wall.

Then everything was wiped out as by an angel's wing, and I fell into a deep sleep.

When I awoke my dark thoughts were vanishing away like a bad dream in the morning. The rain had ceased, the gas had been put out, and I could see by the glow on the peonies of the wall paper that the sun was shining with a soft red light through the Holland blinds of my windows.

I heard the sparrows chirping on the sills outside; I heard the milkman rattling his cans; I heard the bells of a neighboring church ringing for early communion.

I closed my eyes and held my breath and listened to the sounds in my own room. I heard the kettle singing over the fire; I heard somebody humming softly, and beating a foot on the floor in time to the tune; and then I heard a low voice (it was Emmerjane's saying from somewhere near my bed: "I dunno but what she's awake. Her breathing ain't agoin' now."

Then I turned and saw the nurse sitting before the fire with something on her lap. I knew what it was. It was my child, and it was asleep. In spite of my dark thoughts my heart began to yearn for it.

And then came the great miracle.

My child awoke and began to cry. It was a faint cry, oh, so thin and weak, but it went thundering and thundering through me.

There was a moment of awful struggle, and then a mighty torrent of love swept over me.

It was Motherhood.

My child! Mine! Flesh of my flesh!

All my desire for my baby's death to save it from the pains of life was gone, and my heart, starved so long, throbbed with tenderness.

My baby was at my breast and my sufferings were at an end.

Was Christopher Columbus a Spanish Hebrew?

Madrid, June 28.

EVERY native American, every citizen of the United States, will be interested in evidences which have lately come to light concerning the birthplace of Christopher Columbus. It has been generally assumed that the discoverer of the New World was a native of Italy, a Genoese. There is now reason to believe that Columbus was a Spaniard and of the Jewish race.

A brochure setting forth evidence to this effect is shortly to be published by Enrique Maria de Arribas y Turul, the well-known historian and investigator of ancient MSS. In the following article Senor de Arribas sets forth briefly the main facts of this interesting discovery.

By Enrique Maria de Arribas y Turul,
The Celebrated Spanish Historian.

CHRISTOBAL is Spanish for Christopher, which means "Christ Bearer." Colon, with the accent on the last syllable, is Spanish for Columbus. There being positive evidence that the great discoverer was born, not in Italy, but in Spain, Christobal Colon is the correct form of his name.

Genoa has no more right to call him her "distinguished son" than the eighteen other Italian towns and villages claiming that distinction, backing up their falsehood by exhibiting the very house of his birth, as is done at Calvi, Saona and Cogoleto.

With regard to these Italian claims, the question may properly be asked: "If the Admiral was an Italian, why did he use the Spanish form of his name exclusively? All his known documents are signed "Cristobal Colon" by his own hand. His crest bore the device "A Castilla y a Leon Nuevo Mundi dio Colon" (For Castilia and Leon discovered the New World). And to this day his descendants bear the title, "Marquese Colon, Duke of Veragua."

Accordingly, the Admiral's biography by his natural son Fernando, published in Madrid in 1530, is styled "Historia del Almirante Cristobal Colon."

If his real name was Columbo (Italian for the Latinized Columbus), why its suppression by the owner of the name himself, by his family, coat of arms and all public documents referring to him and used during his lifetime?

The proofs exist, and will be given in my forthcoming brochure in the form of documents showing that Colon was born in the Spanish town of Pontevedra, where his people were so well known that the family name occurs no less than eighteen times between 1413 and 1528 in documents relating to taxes, commercial enterprises, public services, etc.

The birth of the discoverer is variously stated as having taken place anywhere between 1435 and 1446 or 1447. I have unearthed a document in the Pontevedra town archives showing a co-partnership between the families of Colon and Fonterosa, purveyors to the Archbishop of Santiago, whose court they supplied with fish. The commercial union took place in 1437. What could be more natural than a subsequent nuptial partnership, especially since the Jews of those days made it a point to cement their industrial partnerships by inter-marriage?

If the marriage was solemnized shortly after the co-partnership was entered into, the contention of nearly all American-English authorities that the discoverer was born about 1437 would be borne out. Moreover, there has never been any dispute about the family name of Colon's mother, which, aside from differences in the spelling owing to Spanish, Italian or Latin affiliations, is everywhere given as Fonterosa.

But why does the discoverer himself claim Genoa as his birthplace? First, because then, as now, the prophet had little credit in his own country, and again because Colon was of Jewish descent, both on his father's and his mother's side. Documents exist showing that as late as 1489 Andreas Colon, his wife and mother-in-law were sentenced to the stake and executed at Tarragona because they were suspected of Jewish sympathies.

The Colon family had evidently embraced the Christian faith some time before—perhaps a long time before—hence it was considered an especially heinous act to be in sympathy with the proscribed race.

In the case of Colon such a suspicion was the more dangerous, as his mother's conversion to Christianity probably was of later date than that of the Colons, for the Pontevedra documents mentioned give the names of her relatives as Abraham, Alcazar, Jacob, Benjamin, etc., while the mother's own name, Suzanna, was regarded as exclusively and compromisingly Jewish.

Colon, the petitioner for crown funds to hunt for new roads to fabulous China and Japan; Colon, "attendant in waiting to the King"—such was the intending discoverer's title in the late eighties—had most potent reasons then for preserving his incognito, especially while the Council of Salamanca was considering his petition for men and ships. The mere suspicion of his being related to the apostates of Tarragona, or, indeed, to the Spanish Colons, would have been fatal to his projects.

Just the same, Colon's letters prove that he had strong private leanings toward his former co-religionists. Among his correspondents were the philanthropist, Luis de Santangel; Bocher, the merchant prince, and Levy, the physician, all three Jews, but so eminent and so highly esteemed that the inquisition dared not touch them.

However, if the Church, which opposed his projects on Biblical and other grounds, had had reason to believe that the relations between the petitioner Colon and the Jews were other than those dictated by friendship, the New World would never have been discovered by Colon. Their Catholic Majesties would never have been allowed to fit out a Jew to prove that Bible geography was radically wrong. It is far more likely that Cristobal Colon would have perished at the stake, like his cousin, Andrew Colon—for they were cousins.

Colon's tendencies to express himself in the style of the Old Testament are familiar to scholars. He loved Biblical quotations, and his writings were models of Hebrew literature.

Colon's log of October 11 has this entry: "The Nina discovered a stake covered with dog-roses, and with these signs all of them breathed and were glad." The next day at 2 a. m. the island afterward named San Salvador was sighted. He took possession at once, "giving thanks to God by kneeling upon the shore and kissing the ground with tears of joy for the great mercy."

That was on Friday. If it had been Saturday instead, would Colon, with his inbred respect for the Sabbath, have landed at once?

Georgia's Most Beloved Mother-in-Law---"Best in World," Says Slaton

The Governor Frankly Adores Mrs. W. D. Grant, Who Isn't a Bit Ashamed of Her 75 Years, Can Talk of Constitutional Law and Yet Plays Piano With the Touch of a Girl.

By TARLETON COLLIER.

THE mansion of Georgia's Governor is blessed with a mother-in-law. And over at the mansion, they consider her ideal—particularly does her son-in-law, who is Governor John M. Slaton.

Atlanta society agrees with the Governor in his estimate of Mrs. W. D. Grant. She is cheery, she is charming. The younger set holds no party complete without her presence, for it is plain that her soul has found the well of eternal youth, and that she is as young and as merry as the youngest in spite of the fact, as she will tell you without reserve, that she is rounding 75 years.

Men of affairs coming into the Slaton home ask first of all for Mrs. Grant. She can talk to them and can interest them about constitutional law or the cotton crop, or about anything else as their predilections demand. And with it all, she is the most gracious lady alive.

But the attachment most marked is that which exists between the son-in-law and mother-in-law.

"She is the best mother-in-law in the world," said Governor Slaton yesterday.

His regard for her, it is widely known—and he will admit it—borders on idolatry.

"Nobody can know her but to love her. Her charm of manner, her mental gifts, her brightness, her sweetness, all make her the most attractive person I know."

The two frankly are lovers. Here is what Mrs. Grant said about her son-in-law:

"He is the best son-in-law in the world. He is a good man. Nobody can know him but to love him. He likes to have me with him."

And then she commented, self-deprecatingly: "As if anybody would enjoy the company of an old woman who is nearly seventy-five!"

The dear lady. As if anybody would not enjoy her company.

She met a reporter in the hall of her home at Peachtree and Pine Streets, with a hand outstretched in greeting, and with a gay laugh that found its way into every word she spoke. Her dress was white, the color of her hair; her face was surpassingly kind, her voice and her laugh were low-toned and soft, for Mrs. Grant is a daughter of the old South.

"You don't want to interview me," she protested. "I'm just an old woman."

Which drew forth the declaration that she was herself, and therefore to be interviewed, as Georgia's most beloved woman and mother-in-law.

She was reconciled to the proposition of being interviewed when informed that the subject was her son-in-law.

"I ought to know Governor Slaton," she said. "He married my only daughter, and they knew each other as children. At the University of Georgia he roomed with my son, John W. Grant, and the two have been life long friends. When I went to the LaGrange Female College in 1849, I knew his mother as a college mate, and I boarded with two of his aunts, Miss Rebecca and Miss Caroline Slaton."

So the Governor is more than a relative by marriage to his mother-in-law. And she liked him, she said, from the very first, when he was a little boy.

He was a good boy, said his mother-in-law. There were no cherry tree episodes nor days of "hookey," nor anything not circumspect that she could recall.

And then he married her daughter, and came to live with her in the Grant home at Peachtree and Pine Streets. The lives of mother-in-law and son-in-law have been cast together pretty much all the way.

Now a great trial has come to Mrs. Grant. Her son-in-law has become the Governor of Georgia, and he and his wife perforce must move into the mansion down town. The Governor is begging her daily to move with them into the executive mansion. Her son is as urgent that she make her home with him, and she can not decide.

"The Governor and my daughter have lived with me all the time," she said, outlining the argument that has worried her exceedingly of late. "It is hard to lose them, and he likes to have me with him."

Then her own son's invitation is alluring. He lives just next door to her, and she argues that if she takes up her residence with him she will not have to close her own home.

She is proud of that home, and it is likely that the last argument will win.

"Isn't it a shame to close a house like this?" she said wistfully, yesterday, switching on the lights in the dainty parlor. "We have made it a home."

There was pride in her voice. Her home is dearer to her than the prestige of the State's mansion.

In the center of the room was a quaint grand piano. She touched it lovingly.

"But don't interview me," she said. "Sit down, and let me play something."

She opened the piano. She did it herself. Later, when she went out, she put on her rubbers herself, scorning the proffered help of a maid, and admitted that she scorned it. Independence is one of her chiefest glories.

And so this lady, who insists that she is near 75 years old, opened the piano, and with a touch as sympathetic and as varied and as true as that of any conservatory girl, played a rippling opera.

"Do you know," she remarked, with her laugh, when she had finished, "I haven't seen the notes to that opera for forty years. They were burned then, but they seem to live in my memory. It's an old opera, called 'Norma,' and I suppose you have never heard it before. Pretty good for an old woman, don't you think?"

Pretty good from any one, and doubly charming as she played it. This wonderful mother-in-law.

She played another bit of old opera.

"Remember," she said, "I have not said anything that would do to put in the paper. I have just played you a little music. Let that do for an interview."

As an interview it did pretty well, revealing the charm and the variety of accomplishments and the naivete and the camaraderie of her.

She was yet unconsciously to reveal another charm—that of her youthfulness.

"Everybody is very good to me," she said, discussing the dilemma that confronts her as to making her home with the Governor and the Governor's wife, her daughter, or with her son, John W. Grant. "Everybody is good to me, the young people particularly. I love them."

Then she talked about Atlanta's young people, the women particularly, in a way to prove that she loved them.

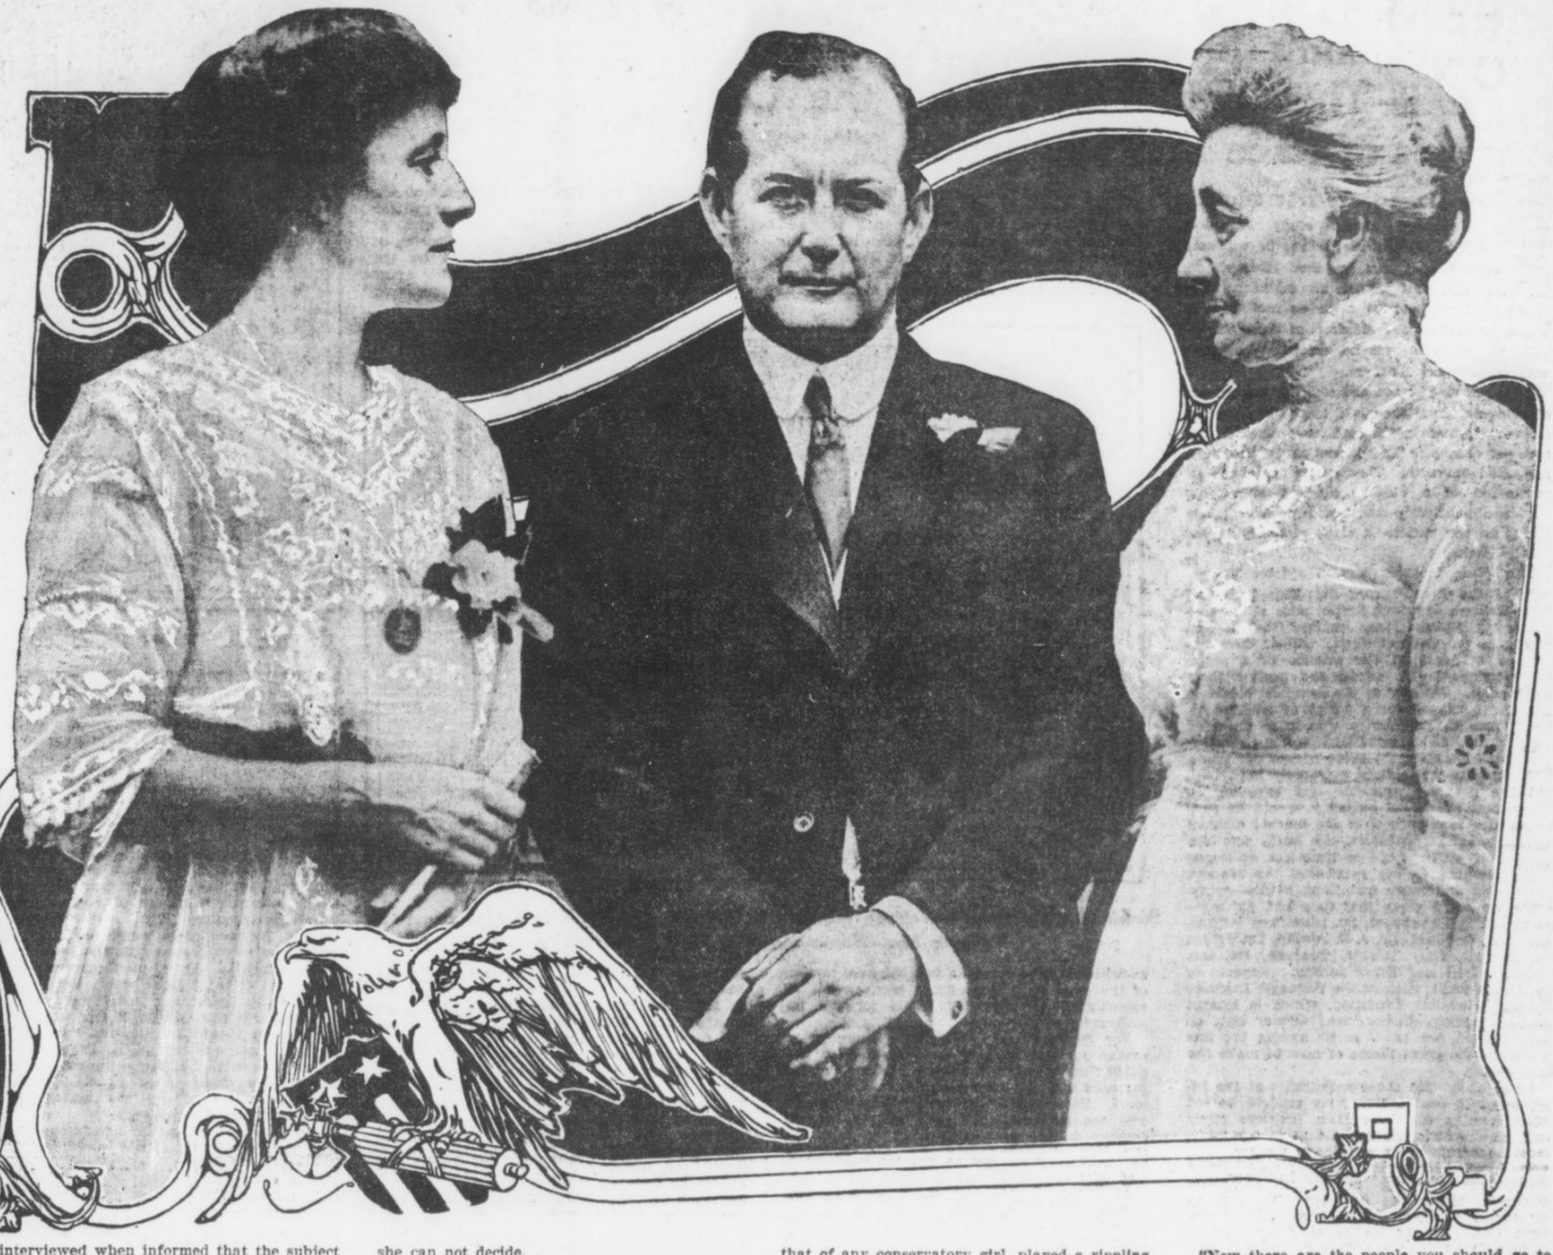
"Now there are the people you should go to for your stories," she remarked. "Go to the girls and young matrons of Atlanta. They have the Southern culture and refinement that girls had fifty or seventy-five years ago. And added to that they have the advantages of education and of new thought. Worlds have been discovered since I went to school, Huxley and Darwin and great poets have lived and have done their work. With all this, I think the Southern girl of to-day ought to be the most attractive person in the world. They have had wonderful advantages and a wonderful environment. I think with their advantages I could have written a book, or have done or said something worth while."

Instead, she has become the ideal mother-in-law. She has become a hostess whose charm and graciousness men and women of every section of the United States have praised warmly. She has become a beloved woman.

This wonderful mother-in-law.

She would not dare tell what it takes to be a perfect mother-in-law. In fact, she insists that she is not that. But there is the word of others that she is. And there is the evidence of her own life that the prerequisites of perfect mother-in-lawhood are independence, an infinite variety of thought to fit every mood and every circle, the charm of graciousness, and always a smile.

Goevrnor and Mrs. Slaton with Mrs. W. D. Grant, "the best mother-in-law in the world." Below is another view of Mrs Slaton and Mrs. Grant.



Law in the Southern States : : By Joseph E. Pottle

Solicitor General Ocmulgee Circuit

THE press of the country latterly is full of so-called statistics and unwarranted inferences relative to the matter of law enforcement in the South, as well as obedience to and respect for the law in the same section.

I am not one of those who believe that the law is altogether as well and impartially enforced as it might be in our State and section, or that there is such universal reverence for the law and the courts as the welfare of the people demands. Things might be better—yes; but they also might be worse.

I am writing this solely for the reason that I confess to a feeling of some resentment and more or less indignation at seeing my State and section constantly exploited as the chief offender against the law, and our people held in invidious comparison with sundry foreign nations.

It is declared, for instance, that in Birmingham, Ala., and Atlanta, Ga., typical modern Southern cities, a far greater number of homicides is committed in a single year than in the city of London, with her seven million population; that while in Great Britain and Canada 80 per cent of those indicted for murder are convicted, less than 20 per cent are punished here. And the conclusion drawn is to our very great discredit, both as to law obedience and law enforcement.

In making these discreditable comparisons, all sight is lost of the conspicuous, all-important consideration that the criminal element in Georgia and Alabama is made up largely of that class of our population the members of which notoriously, since the war, feel very lightly the restraining influence of the laws of God, of self-respect, and the laws of the land.

It is no exaggeration to say that in both the States named, and I do not doubt that the rule holds good in the other Southern States, the percentage of indictments for homicides of negroes to whites is as 85 to 15.

I have lately taken the trouble to go over the record, insofar as my judicial circuit is concerned, (the Ocmulgee) for the past ten years, the period of my incumbency of the office of Solicitor General of that circuit. This circuit, located in Middle Georgia, is, I think, fairly typical of the large majority of the other Georgia circuits.

In seven of the counties composing the circuit (the Eighth, Hancock, not being included because until recently it belonged to an adjoining circuit), the number of homicide indictments for the past ten years has been 245, or an average of 24 1-2 per annum—an average annual homicide of about 3 1-2 to the county.

The counties average, in round numbers, 19,000 population, or an average annual homicide roll to the county of about 1-50 of 1 per cent.

Again, of these 245 homicides in the period referred to, 151 were either not tried or were acquitted, and the remainder of 94 were convicted; that is, of those indicted at least 65 per cent were convicted of some grade of homicide.

When it is remembered that it is almost the universal practice in Georgia for grand juries to indict one charged with murder without anything like thorough investigation of the facts, it will not, I think, be justly contended that this apparently small percentage of convictions justifies the sweeping generalization that our people are careless and indifferent in the law's enforcement.

The statement above that grand juries, as a rule, prefer indictments for murder on slight evidence, involves no criticism of them. They usually take the view, and in my opinion it is the JUST view to take, that a case of that gravity should be investigated by the trial jury, if there is any evidence to justify the belief that the defendant might probably be guilty.

Of the 245 homicides tried in the Ocmulgee circuit in ten years, 225 were negroes and 20 were white. So it will be seen that of the, in round figures, 150,000 population in the seven counties, two white persons per annum were indicted for murder, or 2-7 per annum in each county.

The white population of the seven counties is, say, 70,000. So it will be seen that in this representative judicial circuit the percentage of homicides by white persons to the white population is for ten years 20 out of 70,000, an average annual percentage of 2 out of 70,000.

So, after all, the record does not show that our folks are so bent on murder, and so thirsty for each other's blood.

It is, of course, infinitely regrettable that our negro population occupies our courts and fills our jails in such disproportion to their relative numbers, but I do not believe in the justice, fairness or expediency of arraigning an entire section because of so unfortunate a condition, and as a citizen of this State and of the South I want to deny that the record authorizes the popular and much exploited conclusion that the white people, the Anglo-Saxons of the South, are one whit worse than any other peoples on this earth, either in their respect for the law, their obedience to the law or their fearless and impartial enforcement of the law.

I know one thing with absolute certainty, and that is that in the counties composing the Ocmulgee Circuit, in Georgia, there is practically a universal disposition to enforce the law against all lawbreakers of every class.

In my long term of official service there have been few verdicts of not guilty which, partisan prosecutor (in a sense) as I was, I did not thoroughly approve.

The much flaunted law's delays, frivolous technicalities, easy escapes from criminal charges, have shown themselves but little in this representative and average circuit.

I believe I do but simple justice to the jurors, the judges and the bar of the other circuits of the State and throughout the South when I express the opinion that, in the main, the same condition exists there also.

Why Washington Society Women Are Studying Eugenics

Leaders of the Nation's Social Life Join Mrs. John Hays Hammond's Interesting Class, Designed Especially to Guide Their Sex Throughout the Country in the Principles of Race Improvement.

By Mrs. John Hays Hammond.

EVERY woman should study eugenics. Such knowledge should not be withheld until women have reached motherhood. At heart and soul we are all mothers. The instinct of motherhood is in us and if it is not exercised toward children of our own, its influence at least can be extended to those who actually are mothers.

Those of us who see and feel the importance of bringing home the plain truths of eugenics to every woman in the land have also felt the need of examples and influence in the most respected quarters. Thus came about the organization of a class composed of women who are politically and socially the highest placed in the nation—a class virtually in the White House.

This class includes Mrs. Woodrow Wilson, wife of the President of the United States; Mrs. William Jennings Bryan, wife of the Secretary of State; Mrs. Justice Hughes, and others in the Cabinet circle. All of these are serious students of the science of eugenics and were eager to extend and perfect their knowledge. We met at my home in Washington and arranged for a series of lectures by Dr. Elnora C. Folkmar, a woman of profound scholarship, clean mind and spiritual vision. For these qualities we chose her as our guide. Each quality we deemed extremely important, but the greatest were the last two, for we knew that unless so guided it would be easy to wander into perusal of the morbid class of works on allied subjects, the study and discussion of which would be time lost, or worse.

We adopted as our text-books the reports, pamphlets and more ambitious works—everything we could glean that they had written—by Dr. C. B. Davenport, Dr. Llewellyn Barker, Dr. H. B. Goddard, Dr. J. E. Jordan, Dr. Prince A. Morrow, Drs. Galston, Pearson, Bateson, Saleeby, Bell and Starr Jordan. Reports of Dr. Davenport's work at the Carnegie Institute for Experimental Evolution, which is located at Cold Spring Harbor, near Oyster Bay, on Long Island, we know to be among the last words on the great theme of how to make the race better.

I purposely cite these authorities at the beginning lest the conscientious student be led into by-paths of worse than fruitless study through meretricious works that to my mind, have no excuse for having been written.

Thus the weekly lectures were well started by several meetings under Dr. Folkmar's guidance, before the Summer dispersion to our country homes, and each member of the class had received an impetus to Summer study that will undoubtedly displace the Summer novel in her interest and in its far-reaching effects.

We are eager for the formation of similiar classes among other women in this country and will be glad to give them such help and direction as we can, for, while each life in this world is the product of two half lives, yet the chief responsibility for the uplift and betterment of the home rests with the mother. The women in these researches. I am glad to see that women's clubs in Iowa have arranged for baby shows at their annual county fairs, at which there are lectures on standardization of infants, so that all who attend will know the good points of a baby as well as they know those of a dog or horse. Oregon is preparing for a baby fair this Fall, preparatory to a great baby fair at the exposition in San Francisco in 1915. All these movements are placing an ideal of race before us—and indiviouals and the race are better for ideals.

so-called childless woman is a spiritual mother of the race and in no sense escapes the responsibility of providing ideals for the improvement of the race.

For mothers and for fathers there is no excuse for lack of that knowledge which will guide their children into wise selection of life partners and the giving of a temple to future souls. Parents who ignore this responsibility, who are careless of it, are ignorant of the dangers in the path or neglect to flash the signals of danger, should bow their heads in shame.

Women who wish to know more of this science can form in classes and clubs and hear lectures by a woman medical authority. I do not advise the selection of a male lecturer because there is inevitably the sex barrier to frank discussion. A high-minded, clean-souled woman is the right guide for

We have taken (and we would advise others taking up the study and aligning themselves with the students and apostles of eugenics) a conservative stand. In eight States measures have been taken to prevent the continuance of a blood line of the unfit—those who are mildly termed the "socially inadequate," or, more brutally put, those who are unable to earn their own living and have to be taken care of by the State or those with the criminal taint. There is much to be said for this, especially when we are faced by the appalling fact that New York State, for instance, spends one-fifth of its income in caring for its unfit—unfit either through criminal bias or by reason of feeble-mindedness. Yet in such cases there are possibilities of succeeding viciousness that are amazing and alarming. These measures are still in an experimental state. It is encouraging to learn that in one institution in Indiana 150 of the inmates voluntarily acceded to such a measure for the good of the community. Believing themselves undesirable citizens, they preferred that their traits should not descend to posterity.

But it is the sense of the class of students whom I represent that these are grave measures and that the lack of moral responsibility might inaugurate an era of viciousness that would be appalling. That is the danger and that is the reason we weigh without yet deciding for so extreme a measure. We believe in the custodial care of all those persons who by mental or moral taint would transmit qualities whose possessors would make bad citizens. Call it colonization, if you will, the custodial care should be effective. It would involve a great expense to the State; yes, but it would save that other enormous drain, the foundling asylums, most of the homes for friendless children and the maternity hospitals maintained by charity.

We believe that public sentiment (and if that fail, the law) should require that all clergymen performing marriage ceremonies should first have a certificate of health and character of both parties. If it can be made practicable to give also an abstract of the health and character of the parents and grandparents of both parties, so much the better. In time, I have no doubt, this can be made quite feasible.

We believe in warning the young against the scourges that punish the sins of youth that we have dismissed as "youthful follies." We believe that men should as early as the years of going away to college acquaint their sons with those dangers and in a most impressive manner. A woman whom I well know took double means to this end. Before her eldest son left his home she had an earnest talk with him. She told him of the dignity of parenthood, the duty of preparing for that honor clean bodies and minds and souls. She said to him:

"The dearest moment of my life will be when a child of yours is placed in my arms and I see it is perfect. But if you descend to wallow in filth I shall think of you with the disgust with which I regard a swine."

This solemn duty done, she arranged during his first week in college, and before the insidious spell of temptation could beset him, for his visit to the Massachusetts Hospital. Under guidance of a conscientious physician, a friend, she insisted that he spend a day there seeing all the horrors of the results of wrong living. He looked upon drunkenness and degeneracy. He saw the dying. He witnessed major operations; saw men and women sunken to the lowest depths of depravity. Evidently the lesson was a vital one, for when, two years later, the time came for his younger brother to go to college and the mother prepared for him the same plan the elder brother begged off for the younger.

"Don't make him go through that," he pleaded. "He is so imaginative."

"Very well," responded the mother, "if you will promise to take him in hand."

"I shall," promised the elder brother, and there is evidence that he has kept his word.

While I think this duty of acquainting the young with the terrors that lurk in wrong paths is necessary, I do not believe in anticipating by one hour the question in the mind of youth. As well tear open the leaves of a but to hasten the blooming of a rose. Vigilance is desirable, but awakening morbid curiosity is deplorable.

"Make the stock better," is our watchword. By informing ourselves we can go far in this direction, and knowledge has ever been power. These are some principles of eugenics which should become a part of the common stock of knowledge.

The feeble-minded are increasing several times as fast as the normal.

Babies inherit both the defects and excellences of their parents, mental and physical. There is no case recorded of a normal child being born of feeble-minded parents.

It is becoming a matter of common knowledge that one-fifth of the blind lose their eyesight because of infection at birth.

Our institutions are being filled with the blind, with neurasthenics, paralytics and mental defectives.

The laws of inheritance are not the only agents in the rearing of fine children. Conditions of environment promote or impair the production of perfect offspring. Those conditions should be known to all persons of the age of parenthood.

The greatest cause of infant mortality is the fact that children are born without a sufficient "biological capital" to meet the demands of life. They quickly succumb in the struggle for existence, filling graves or public institutions.

Eugenics impresses upon us that our immigration laws should restrict the immigration of stocks unfit to blend with the American population. The representative of one of the Powers is quietly working to keep the unfit of his nation at home for that reason. He told me so.

The characteristics of children show that many defects are traceable to parents who are either too old or too young. Thirty-seven per cent of all swindlers are the children of parents who are more than forty-one years old. A majority of the crimes of violence against property, as incendiarism, are committed by the children of too young parents. Yet the children of the young parents show the greater intelligence. Fifty-two per cent (more than half) of the assassins are the children of elderly parents.

We should all know that consanguineous marriages (those of close relatives, as cousins) may have disastrous results. If only because cousins are liable to have the same traits and marriage and parenthood would cause these traits to become more marked, they should be avoided because of intensifying family faults which might disappear in a generation or two of remote matings. The anti-eugenists point to Cleopatra as a proof of the value of inbreeding. She was the daughter of a wedded brother and sister, for it was the custom then for brothers and sisters to wed and so keep the throne of the Ptolemies in the family. True, Cleopatra was wonderfully beautiful, but beauty is not the chief purpose of the eugenists. The truth is that if she were living to-day Egypt's beautiful queen would be in the ward of Matteawan or some other asylum for the criminally insane. Consanguineous marriages between persons of weak mentality are a source of both crime and insanity.

A second principle is that those unable for bodily or mental reasons to earn a living will, if permitted to marry, bequeath other charges to the state. Germany and Austria have provided that no person living upon charity or receiving state assistance shall be permitted to marry.

If an insane or imbecile person marries a normal one, one-half or at least one-fourth of their children usually inherit the abnormality.

If two epileptics marry, their children will all be epileptics, and if two imbeciles marry they will produce imbeciles.

A woman may be more safely trusted to marry above her station than a man. Most mesalliances are made by men. It is a woman's instinct to raise herself in the marriage scale.

The tendency of nature is to slump. If a fit and unfit person marry, the children are liable to be more like the unfit than the fit person. This is a regrettable truth which we cannot evade.

The fear is in some minds that a knowledge of eugenics will banish romance. Far from it. It will make marriages happier as well as better. There will always be love, and by making the race better we will make love more permanent. It comes back to our watchword, study to "Make the stock better."

We do not believe in the elimination of the infant unfit. When children have come into the world let us take care of them. The Greek idea of murdering the weakling infant does not accord with our civilization. The world would have been deprived of much of its greatness had we adopted this law. Goethe, for instance, was a weakling infant. But, once again, I say, let us study how to make the stock better.

"Give Your American Children a Regular Course in Manners," Says M. de FOUQUIERES

ANDRE DE FOUQUIERES, the Parisian arbiter of the elegances, who recently made a memorable visit to the United States, has addressed the fashionable women of Paris, among whom were many members of of the American colony, on the manners and appearance of American children.

He generously praises the spirit and courage of American boys and delicately suggests that a regular course in manners would do them no harm. Here is the report of his address, furnished exclusively to this newspaper:

By the Chevalier Andre de Fouquieres.

HAPPY American children! How I admire and envy them! They lead a life of freedom, sport and open air, which is very different from that of our French children, who grow pale from long hours passed in hard study.

American children are at their best in the country and country towns. I have observed them there with much pleasure. If I had only seen New York, I should have gone away with a monstrous idea of the American attitude toward children.

Children are evidently unwelcome visitors in New York. I cannot describe to you my stupefaction on finding that in many apartment houses they would not receive children and would not permit them to be born. This policy is absolutely unjust and immoral. The divine and human laws require us to do our best to found a family here below.

I am shocked at the thought that a child can be denied the right to live anywhere. I love children with all my heart. They are the consolation of our sorrows, the hope and the light of our existence. In a word, they are the future. Indeed, I often feel very sad when I reflect that as a bachelor I cannot know the joys of family life. Nothing can be sweeter and more beautiful than to prolong one's own existence in that of one's children, to bequeath to them one's traditions and one's sentiments.

The child is the sunshine of the house. I realized this when I visited the other day the family of an employe who had shown me great kindness on the ship going to America. He had three little rooms, neat as new pins, in a respectable quarter of New York. On coming home from work he found health, exercise and happiness in playing with his two children, aged four and five years. This trio was completed by a fourth, a fine parrot, who was not the least talkative of the group.

"But, alas!" said the father to me, "We shall soon be driven out of our little home, because we make a little noise, because we enjoy ourselves too much."

In France, if we do not have many children, we would at least not dream of showing such harshness to them when they do come. Public opinion in Paris, I am happy to say, would not permit a landlord to close his doors to people guilty of having children. Our landlords are less cruel. Sometimes they forbid us the possession of a cat or a dog, or of any animal which bites, scratches or howls, but not of a dear little baby.

There are women in New York, and also in Paris, who prefer not to have children for fear of spoiling their figures, or losing their freedom. These are doubtless exceptions, but does not philosophy teach us that the exceptions tend to become the rule?

Let us face this delicate question bravely. No matter whose susceptibilities I may hurt, I feel obliged to say that the wife who does not wish to become a mother is unworthy the name of woman. Evidently she is lacking in a certain natural instinct. Of course, I cannot deny that there are cases where wisdom suggests that it is better not to have a family, but the desire should exist. The healthy and wealthy woman who prefers poodles to babies, should be an object of pity.

I must add that the limited number of children I saw in New York appeared strong and healthy. They have fresh complexions, well developed muscles, and an energetic bearing. They have an air of frankness in the eyes that pleases me. Everything about them betokens strong will. One understands that they are preparing to be business men from their earliest years. They imitate the papa and follow in his footsteps.

One of these little men, nine years old, said to me with a very important air: "I'm going downtown on business." Evidently he had the ambition to make money at this early age. This manner of facing life gives the American boy the assurance and independence of a man. In France our boys remain under the control of their mothers until they are quite young men. We have too many mothers' darlings.

Children brought up in the American way are quite capable of traveling around the world alone, when they are seventeen or eighteen years old. In France the American method of education has already had its influence on the classes of society that are susceptible to ideas from abroad. Many French fathers of families are now planning to send their sons to the United States to complete their education and cultivate a spirit of independence and self-reliance.

I am familiar with the adverse criticisms which two eminent literary psychologists, M. Paul Bourget and M. Henry James, have dared to pass on the American child, and I do not entirely agree with them. They object to his lack of politeness, but I find that that defect, which they greatly exaggerated, is more than counterbalanced by his fine qualities.

It is sport that makes the American child what he is. He learns the word "baseball," with his alphabet. He practices boxing as soon as he is able to walk. I appreciate the vigor of the American boy from personal experience, for I received a remarkably hard and well-aimed snow ball in the neck.

For my part, I believe that the American boy's view of life is the right one. The spirit of sport develops the ardent and competent American youth into practical and successful men. The American lives faster than the European, and this haste makes him a lover of action. Americans do not seem to know the weariness of mind or body of which we see so much in Europe.

The sporting spirit takes hold of the American child at the beginning of his development, inspires a confidence in him which increases the instinct of combat and the quality of courage.

The enemies of sport say that a man who cultivate his muscles does so at the expense of his intelligence. That is an error. There is a balance between muscles and intelligence which a man must find.

Are there fewer scientific men and artists because we have become to-day so generally addicted to sport? Surely we have enough of the former in France. Sport, on the other hand, has a very great educational value. It teaches discipline and application. I know that young athletes in school make the best pupils. Their games occupy them after the hours of study and keep them away from cabarets, evil resorts and harmful reading. Athletic young men are chaste. The experience of training makes them lead a careful life, watch their health, avoid excesses of all kinds, drink less alcohol and go to bed early. Such a life will not, like excessive book study, lead a child into neurasthenia or effeminacy. Indeed, there is no better school to form a man than sport. In France now we are undergoing the happy influence of the spirit of sport. The other day I was walking along the boulevards of Paris. Suddenly I was jostled, whirled around, nearly overthrown by a crowd, which surged toward the terrace of a cafe. I seized a young man who was rushing past me and I asked him, "What is it? Is it a very big fire? Are you going to see the President of the Republic or some King pass by?"

"No, monsieur," said the young man, "but it is the moment when Carpentier takes his appetizer."

I have told you about the best qualities of the American boy, because I feel that that will interest you most. In France to-day we wish to know what is best in foreign nations. It would be idle to deny that the American boy might study the old French traditions of politeness with advantage.

If sport has great educational value, politeness must remain the foremost principle of education.

Good manners and a courteous method of expression facilitate good relations between individuals, between political parties and between nations. Let me emphasize this—that politeness is a most necessary virtue to democracy.

I have observed with pleasure in New York that many men are quite models of politeness. They usually take off their hats in the presence of a lady. Some of them even give up their seats in a car, and others make profuse excuses when they offer you a gloved hand. All that is very well, but I must insist on the necessity of a regular education in politeness by those who have the authority to give it.

In old times good manners were the appanage of an instructed minority. To-day they are the privilege of every man. We should, therefore, take care that every man enjoys his privilege. An ill-bred business man should not be allowed to succeed, and we should help a polite employe to make his fortune. Politeness is the greatest proof of self-control that one can offer. It obliges us to be moderate, and calm. It controls instinct and trains the will. It is not a virtue of the weak.

I should like to see America make an education in politeness obligatory in her schools. A class of an hour a week devoted to this subject would do much good. I do not think that this would interfere seriously with the studies of children they teach so many useless things. A competent professor would teach in his class not only manners, but the savoir-vivre, the art of living rightly, a distaste for rude behavior and an understanding of tact, moderation and correct bearing. That would build up a nation which would gain influence in the world. I do not say that such classes are necessary to the United States alone. They would help us in France to have some day a Chamber of Deputies where the members would not scratch at one another's faces or overwhelm one another with vulgar abuse.

In the Hungarian Parliament recently in the midst of a most important debate there occurred a general free fight, in which fists, teeth and chairs were used as weapons. Such scenes evidently tend to weaken democratic institutions.

The professor of politeness would teach his pupils such simple maxims as the following: "When a lady or a person older than yourself speaks to you, remove you hat and do not put it on again until asked to do so."

"Answer every question with politeness, and never contradict directly anyone who speaks to you. There are other methods of expressing one's opinion than contradiction."

"If you are walking with another person, allow him to take the part of the sidewalk next to the houses."

"If there are three persons, the place in the middle is the place of honor."

"Never enter a salon (a drawing room) without gloves or with the bottom of your trousers turned up. Leave your hat, overcoat and stick in the hall, but keep your gloves on. It is almost as bad to enter a drawing room without gloves as without shoes."

Remember that politeness excites generosity and good will—that is why an ambitious young man should be polite. His manners will win him the approbation, or at least the neutrality, of those with whom he comes into contact, and that will be sufficient to win him success.

The first principle of altruism is not to be displeasing to one's neighbor. Try to be not only courteous in your manners, but in your dress and bearing. What is more displeasing than a person of slovenly appearance wearing perhaps a dirty shirt or an unbrushed coat. The poorest employe may show good taste, even elegance, in this respect. Elegance of dress is a true form of politeness.

Teach your children to be polite, simple and natural; for simplicity, politeness and naturalness are the characteristics of a truly elegant man.

The great noblemen of other days set us examples of politeness which may well serve as models for the American children of to-day. King Louis XVI., the most powerful and absolute monarch of his time, did not hesitate to step aside when he passed on the stairway of his Palace of Versailles a woman, even if she was only a servant. I recall an interesting anecdote of the value of politeness in history that should be of special interest to Americans. The Marshal de Rochambeau, who fought bravely for the Americans in the War of Independence, was one of the many good men condemned to the guillotine during the Reign of Terror. One morning he and a crowd of others were led out of prison to the cart which conveyed the victims to execution. Among them was a priest. The Marshal de Rochambeau and the priest were the last of the party. The old soldier, wishing to show respect to religion, begged the priest to enter first into the vehicle. Removing his hat and bowing with graceful politeness, as if he were totally unaware that they were in the presence of death, he said:

"After you, Monsieur l'Abbe!"

The priest, seeing that the Marshal, who was eighty years old, was much older than himself, did not wish to go first, but, bowing with equal politeness, said:

"After you, Monsieur le Marechal!"

After they had exchanged courtesies for some minutes the jailor interfered, pushed the priest into the cart and said to the Marshal:

"Stand back, old Marshal; there is no room for you to-day."

This very day saw the end of the Terror, the Marshal was released from prison and spent his last days in peace.

I hate roughness of manners and conduct as I do crime. Persons who behave in that way are fundamentally vile in character. If you wish your children to be great men in the State and society, teach them to be chivalrous, which means that they will be ruled by the sentiments of duty and honor.

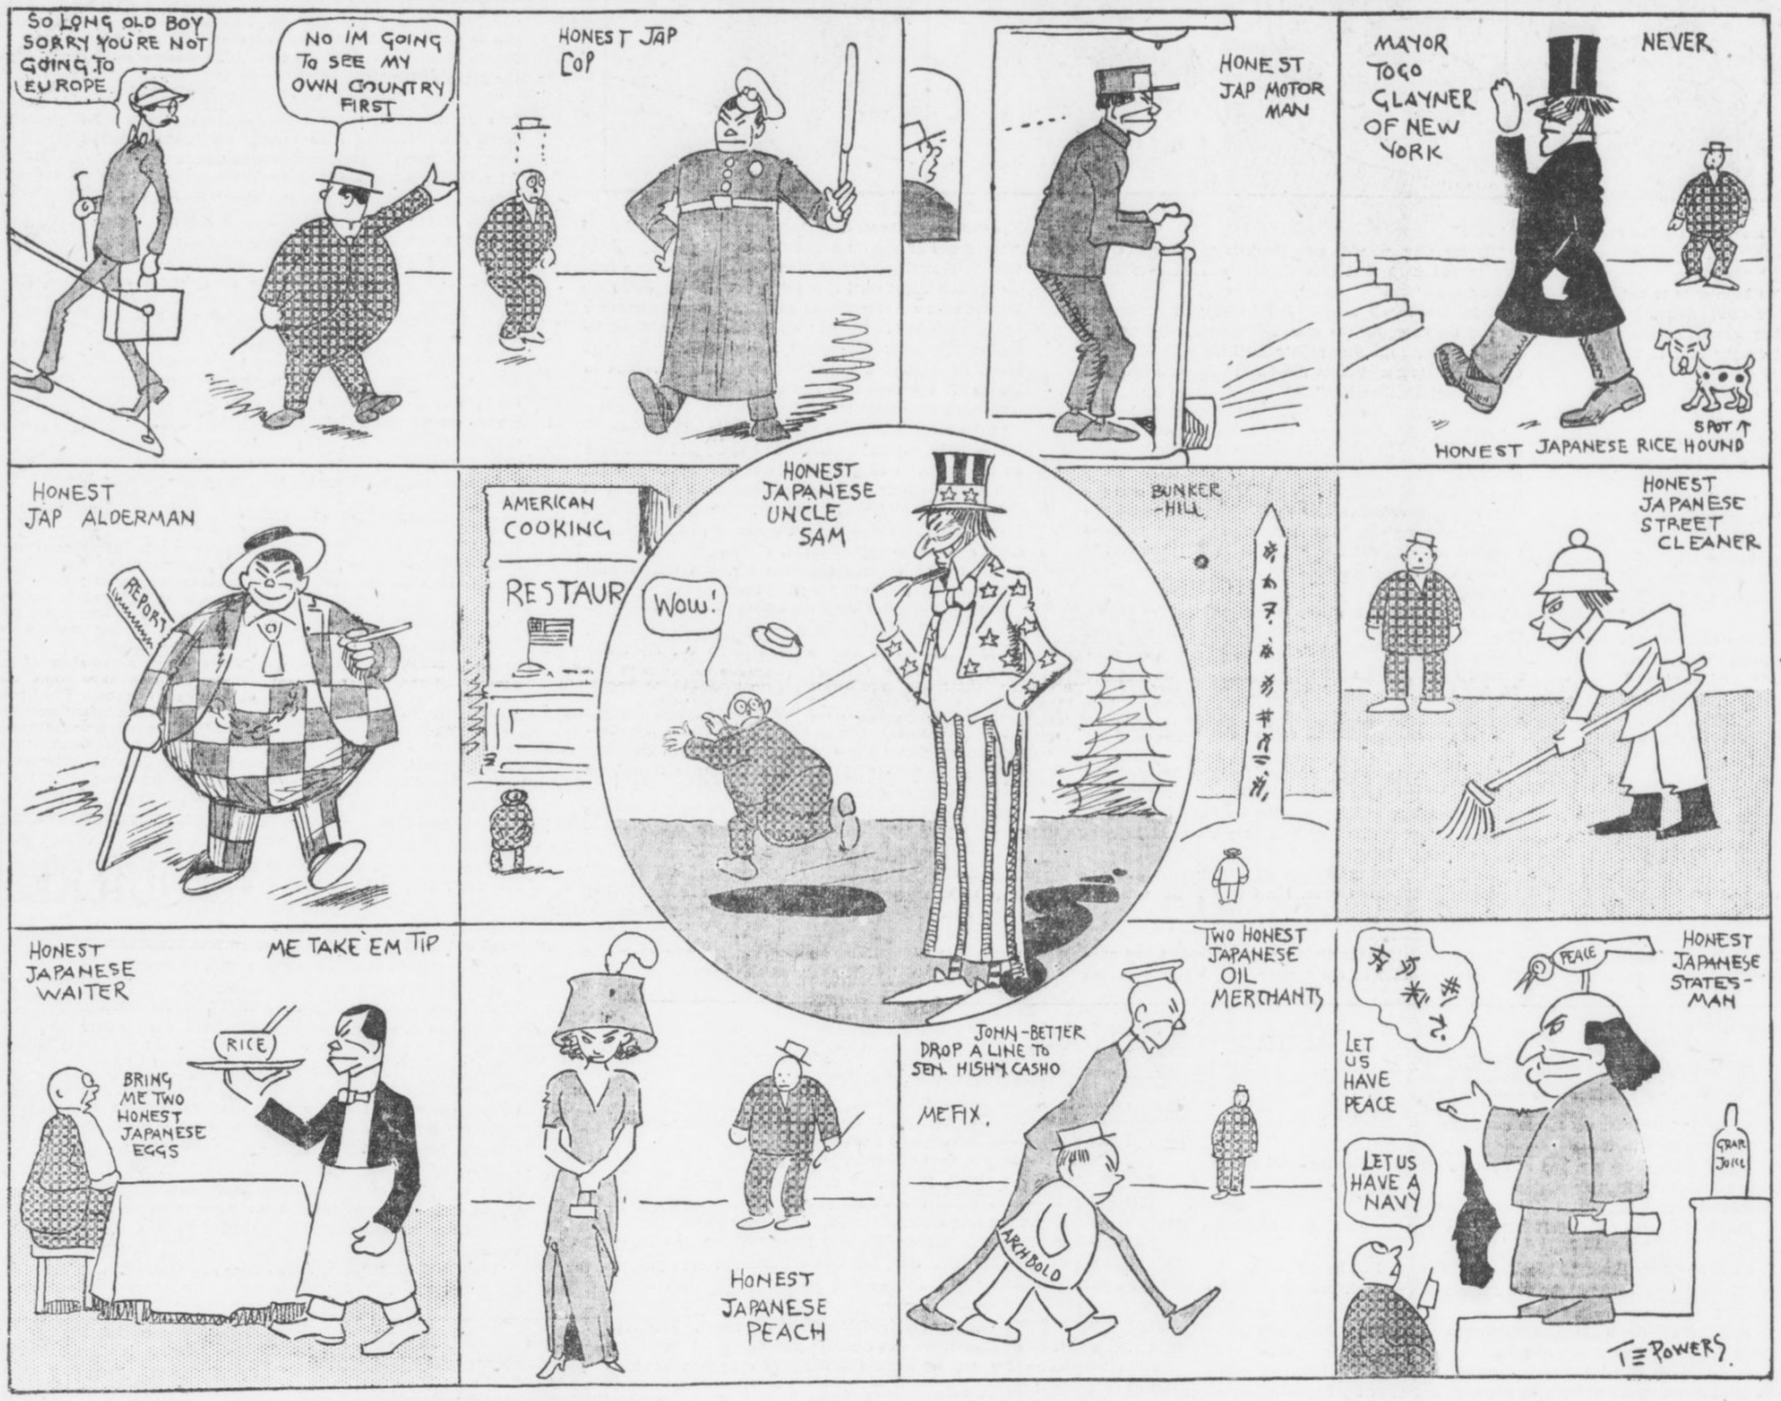
WHAT WE MAY SEE IF WE DON'T GET A BIGGER NAVY



Jolly George Munroe— In His Monologue of Mirth in "All Aboard

HELLO, ladies and fellows. Say, I just got married, and I wish you could have seen how scared I was. The way that minister hollered at me was perfectly paregoric. I was so scared I couldn't remember a thing what to say. Asked me what my name was and I said, "Amsterdam Avenue." And the clergyman was MOST unladylike, the way he hollered when he pointed at McGuckin. Then I yelled "Hooray!" I thought Bryan was elected.

But, be that as it may, there was no reason for the minister to act so ungelluimly. He says to McGuckin pointing to me—whenever he felt that nastiness coming on aim he'd point at ME—he says, "Do you want that?" Huh. You might think I was full of fleas or sump'n. I wouldn't have minded so much myself, but it made me look like a pretzel before a certain party.

Well, to continue our serial, the minister went on to yell very volcanically at Mike. He says, "Will you have this here woman for your awful wedded wife?" McGuckin, the weak-kneed boob, didn't know whether to cry or faint, and he says: "I'm derned if I know. I'll leave it to you, Judge." Well, I thought I'd lost McGuckin sure.

But I got him. Got him cheap, too. Only cost two dollars, and a penknife, and a plug of tobacco, and a few little luxuries like that. I didn't need to pay the two dollars, though, because Mike's ver-wy, ver-wy wealthy. And he gets his money ver-wy, ver-wy easy. He don't swipe it, you know, or any low trick like that, but—I'll whisper it to you—HE'S A GAMBLER! I have to say that awful low to you, because I'm afraid somebody'll go out and shoot him. But simply as a matter of protection for the cops, I'll let you in the secret—yes, HE'S A GAMBLER!

Only yesterday McGuckin went out and won our honeymoon money. He won $9,000 yesterday playing mumblety-peg.

But not all that $9,000 will be passionately spent on our honeymoon. That would be ver-wy, ver-wy extravaganza. McGuckin expects to take a little of it and found a school for New Haven Railroad engineers. But most of it will go toward having my voice agricultured. I've been told that however good my voice is for the stage it is even better on the steamboat, especially when there's a fog. So I want to take a course in fog-voice culture.

I happened to fall in love with McGuckin when he was a mere fireman. Now, if there's anything I love it's a fireman. Oh, give me a fireman or give me death! That's the way I feel about it. McGuckin always said that if we ever happened to be together in a fire he'd carry me down the ladder first. All he needed was a good, strong ladder, he said. Be that as it may, anything with a red shirt certainly does capture my heart.

And Mike is a real fireman, too. Whenever a fire blazes he is always the first one to say, "I fear not. Though the flames lick up their helpless prey, I pray they don't lick me." That's some speech.

Whenever an alarm comes in McGuckin jumps up out of bed, gets shaved, gets a shine, takes a bath, has his valley lift him into his bull-maddening uniform, then calls a taxi and says to the showfure, "Drive me to the nearest fire."

The last time he attended a fire he jumped out of his taxi and ran plumb into one of the engines. It didn't hurt McGuckin much except it cut his big, bright nose off. It was night and he couldn't see near so well then. Well, they took him to Dr. Bunyon to get it sewed on. Mind you, before they took Mike to the doctor his face was perfect. Outside of the missing nose there wasn't a scratch or even a freckle.

Well, Dr. Bunyon got that nose to sit back into place all right, but after sewing and hemstitching and basting and soldering it all on, we found that it was UPSIDE DOWN! That was ver-wy, ver-wy embarrassing for McGuckin. And, no matter how hard we pulled, do you know we couldn't get that nose to separate itself from Mike's physiognomy?

Then it commenced to rain, and McGuckin got a noseful of rain, and water-bugs and hoptoads, and oh, a whole menagerie of living things. Whenever he wanted to blow his bugle he had to stand on his head! So now he's got a nose filter to keep out all intruders.

I had the awfullest time getting my trousseau ready. Some of my dresses were built with a short circuit, and I had pull them together in back with compressed air. If it hadn't been for the aid of Rosie Mulligan, my cousin-in-law, there would never have been any wedding bells for me.

Rosie essayed to get me into my new straight-front, which was to be hidden from sight by a ver-wy collaborate silken kimono brought all the way from Japan. She put her knee right in the middle of my back, and—well, you see, Rosie's ver-wy skinny, oh, ver-wy, and of all the hatpins—but that's neither here nor there. It was in my back. Two pairs of my ribs, loyal old supporters that they'd been during these fifty years, groaned and cracked. I began to choke (not joke) and fell forward on the cruel floor, while Rosie, well she fell right back on her—own responsibility.

Recently I was elected president of the Society for Suspression. We suspress anything we don't like. When I was in Spain last Winter the first thing I did was to go to the stockyards and suspress a couple of bulls. They were going to have a bull-fight and I suspressed it. Oh, I could bull about my trip to Spain until you'd swear off eating roast beef for life.

Well, I'll have to go and get McGuckin's grub ready, because when he's hungry he's ver-wy, ver-wy annoying, and I just don't want to take the trouble this hot weather to suspress him.

The Worst Jokes of the Week

Copyright, 1913, by the Star Company. Great Britain Rights Reserved.

HERE are the worst jokes that have come in to us this week. We paid for 'em the same as we pay for good ones—we think they're worth the money. Now go on with the story.

"SAY, if a New York telephone girl were going west, which road should she properly take?"
"That's easy. The Central, of course."
"Wrong again. She should take the Ear-y line."

WHY are doctors and shoemakers alike?
Because they are healing (heel-ing).

"HE'S a fine violin player."
"Bull-fiddle or cow?"

"WHY are the most religious Hebrews dwelling on Vendover avenue?"
"Because they were commanded to passover, and they vend-over."

"I SEE by the papers the American yacht Prairie Belle went through the Panama Canal all right."
"Did they charge her any toll?"
"Oh, yes; they tolled the Belle when she went by."

"IT'S a great place for spiritualism, up there in Michigan. Rapping and table tipping and seances."
"I suppose that's why it's named Grand Rap-ids."

WHY are the governments of the United States and Canada negligent?
Because they let Niagara Falls.

Spring (a Conversation Between Two Germans.)

"DO you know it what is it Spring?"
"The spring of a bed?" he questioned.
"Ha, ha- I know. You mean a spring of water."
"No, no. Don't you know that the year is it divided into four seasons? One of the seasons is it Spring?"
"So they named some of the chickens in Spring Spring chickens?"
"Spring chickens is it got nothing to do with Spring. Spring is a season—a season, you hear?"
"Ha, ha! I know. Can you see Spring?"
"No, it is in menagerie (imaginary). You see it and you don't see it."
"Oh! A place where they keep animals. So a menagerie is Spring?"
"Now you got it, mein friend!"

How to Dress in the Summer

Copyright, 1913, by the Star Company. Great Britain Rights Reserved.

DRAPING yourself in a bed hammock and wearing a fan in one hand and a tall, cold drink in the other is quite the proper thing.

If even open-work stockings are too warm for the hot weather, try wearing rubber boots. By filling these with ice water they will be found even cooler than stockings.

Ladies find it easier to comb their hair while standing in front of an electric fan, but care should be taken not to allow the hair to become entangled in the fan, as it might spoil the fan, and it is so trying attempting to match hair in the shops these hot days.

Men will find high collars quite comfortable if they leave them at home and wear a soft shirt.

If, at a reception, you are uncomfortably warm, ask for another ice and surreptitiously empty it down your neck.

Take an old tablecloth and the cord out of your bathrobe, secure the tablecloth to your anatomy with the aid of the cord, and you will be properly dressed—as long as you remain in your boudoir.

Do not wear anything light, as light radiates heat.

Do not wear anything dark, as dark colors will absorb rather than reflect the sun.

Wear a smile constantly, take a smile with ice in it every now and then, and insult all your acquaintances in order that they may give you a cool look.

Preferable shades for the dry season include "Rye," "Mint," "Lemon," "Lime," "GINger," "Scotch" (without the plaid) and "Champagne."

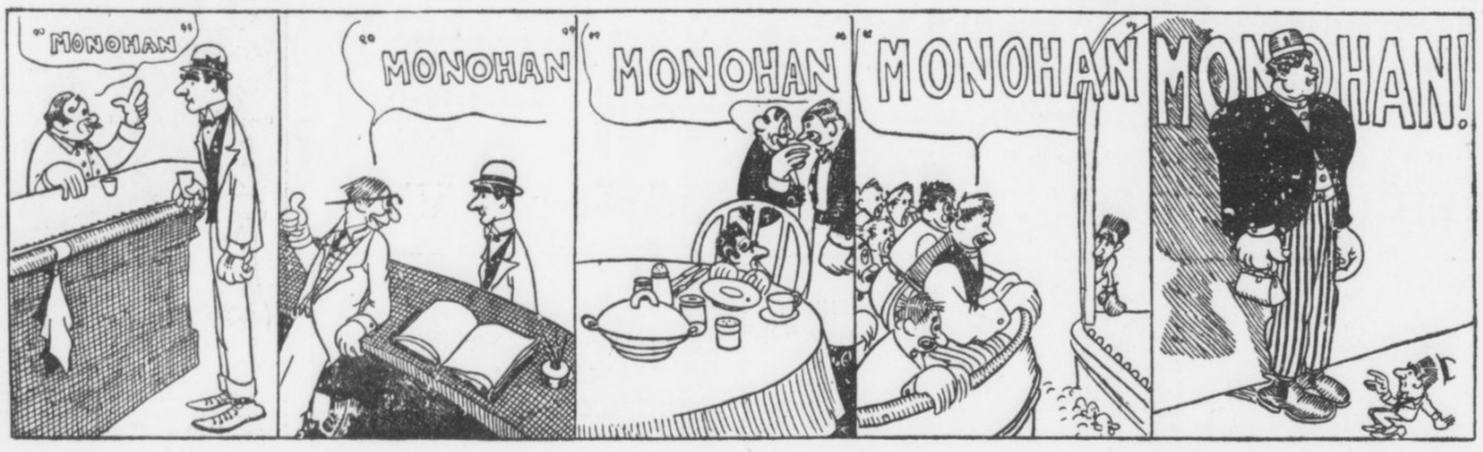
MONOHAN—A True Story, Full of Laughs, That JAMES J. CORBETT Is Telling in Vaudeville

Copyright, 1913, by the Star Company. Great Britain Rights Reserved.

All Stage Rights to This Story Reserved and Protected by James J. Corbett.

Corbett says: "I played in Monohan's district recently. He is dead, but his son sat in the front row and laughed with the rest of the crowd. Monohan's name got a great hand when I first mentioned it."

WHEN I was a youngster, I left San Francisco, after having gained considerable fame as a boxer, and came East, dreaming as all ambitious boxers do of becoming champion of the world. While at Atlantic City waiting for something to turn up in the boxing line, my manager came over to see me. He was not as well known then as he is now—William A. Brady. When he arrived he called me aside and said:



"Well, Jim, at last I know where we can make some sweet money."

"How?" I asked.

"Well, I'll tell you, Jim. I've been over to see Gilmore, of the Central Theatre, in Philadelphia, and he says that if we get up a variety show and you meet all comers, he will give us sixty per cent of the receipts."

"What do you mean, meet all comers?"

"Why, you step out on the stage and offer $100 to anyone who will stay four rounds with you."

Well, I was young and he finally made me listen to what he called reason. I fell for his argument, and agreed to go through with it.

He went off to make the final arrangements. I went to my room, and all night long tossed on my bed like a ship at sea. I don't believe I ever put in a night like it, not even before the most important battle of my career. I never closed my eyes once, but lay all night and blinked at the ceiling.

Well, Brady came back, helped me pack up, and we went to Philadelphia, getting there on the morning of the day we were to open. I was frightened to death, I tell you. I couldn't rest easy until I had gone around and taken a peek at the theatre. When I got there a big sign caught my eye. There it was in big red letters, covering the whole front of the theatre:

$100 TO ANY MAN WHO STANDS BEFORE "THE CALIFORNIA WONDER," JAMES J. CORBETT, FOR FOUR ROUNDS, AT ALL PERFORMANCES THIS WEEK.

When I read the sign I got weak in the knees. As I looked about in a dazed sort of way, I happened to spot a little old-fashioned saloon across the way, and over I went. A funny little bartender was polishing glasses behind the bar. I knew that he didn't know me from Adam. I was a tall skinny kid with a pompadour about two feet high.

"Good morning," said I.

"Good morning," said the funny little bartender, "whata you gonna have?"

"I'll take a little mineral water—and have a drink yourself."

"Sure," said the bartender. "Here's luck."

"Er, by the way," I began, "what is going on at the theatre this week?"

"Oh, there's a young guy going to be over there who offers one hundred dollars to any one who stands up in front of him for four rounds. Corbett, they say his name is, Corbett, the California wonder. And listen to me, he'll be a wonder if he doesn't have his own block knocked off before the week's out."

"Give me a little brandy," I gasped.

"Sure."

"By the way, who do you think is the toughest fellow around here that this Corbett will have to meet during the week?"

"Sure, they're all tough. A lot of hard nuts in this part of the burg, believe me. But there's one guy that will be on hand the first night. He's big Mike Monohan of the Gas House. That's the baby! This Corbett had better overlook that boy."

"Who is this Monohan. What did he ever do?"

"What did he do? Say, you've heard tell of Mike Conley, the Ithaca Giant, haven't you? Well, he came along here at this same theatre and offered $100 to any man who would stand up for four rounds, just like the Corbett guy is going to do. Well, Mike went up on the stage the first night. Say, mister, you ought to have seen 'em carrying out the Ithaca Giant on a shutter!"

"Give me some more brandy."

"Sure."

Then I walked out of the place, crossed the street, and read that sign again. It looked twice as big now. I went slowly down to my hotel, cussing the world in general and Brady in particular.

The first man to speak to me in the hotel was the clerk.

"I see you are meeting all comers this week, Mr. Corbett."

"Yes, I'm going to try to knock the neighborhood out to a man," I answered half-heartedly. "I never tackled this game before and it's got me wondering," I added. "Whom do you think they will have me meet in particular around here."

"Well, I've heard the sports all talking about a Mike Monohan of the Gas House, Mr. Corbett. They say he is a terror."

"Yes, I've heard he's a very tough citizen."

Then I went into the dining room. I hadn't had anything to eat—fact of the matter was, I had been too nervous to eat. I picked up the menu and my eye ran down the batting order. The first thing I spotted was Mulligatawney soup. Exit appetite. Mulligatawney was too much like Mike Monohan, so out I piled!

I started for the theatre about seven o'clock that night, a nervous wreck. When I got there I saw a tremendous crowd forcing its way into the alley that led up to the stage door. I weeded my way through and finally got inside.

"Are they selling seats on the stage?" I asked of a scene shifter.

"No, what makes you ask?"

"Well, the audience is coming through by the stage door."

"Audience nothing. That's not audience. Them's fighters that are waiting to get a crack at Corbett, the California Wonder."

Again my knees beat together like castanets. I walked out among them and thought that I'd spend the time in selecting my first man. Anyone with one lung or one leg might do, I thought. Suddenly I spotted the biggest fellow I ever saw in shoe leather, standing over against the wall. He was all alone. In his hand he held a tiny grip. He looked really funny. The grip, about the size of a woman's purse, seemed to add to his bulk. I walked over and said:

"What's your name?"

"Mike Monohan," came the answer in gruff tones.

I backed away as gracefully as I could and went back on the stage. I singled out a stage hand and brought him to the door. Pointing to Monohan, I told him to go out and tell Monohan that Mr. Corbett had selected his man for the opening performance and for him to come around to-morrow night.

"All right," I heard Monohan say, and off he went toting his little grip in his giant hands.

Well, we selected a fellow named Jack Donovan for the first victim, and I stopped him in a couple of rounds.

But right here I must let you in on a little inside stuff. I arranged for all my victims to dress in the same room with me and my sparring partner, Jim Daly.

About the time the victim was putting on his fighting tights Daly would walk in and tell the victim how Corbett broke a man's jaw with a knock-out in Hoboken the week before, and that another fellow in New York was still unconscious.

By the time Daly had him ribbed up to the queen's taste, I'd walk in and swagger around the dressing room with a sort of knock-'em-out-in-four air. I'd tell Daly that I was hitting harder than ever and that I'd have to let up on some of the fellows for fear of killing some one. I'd get this speech across just about the time that my victim would be lacing his shoes. The result was he would go on the stage frightened within an inch of his life. It never failed to work.

For three weeks this went on. Every night Mike Monohan was at the stage door with his funny little grip, and just so often was he sent away with the request, "Come around to-morrow night; we've picked a man for to-night." But Monohan's gang wouldn't be fooled any longer, and finally the papers came out and roasted the life out of me, saying that I was side-tracking the only man who had a chance to stop me.

I went to Brady and said, "What will we do?"

Brady didn't know, so I suggested that I go out into the alley and pick a row with Monohan, and when it started we were to have the police handy and have Monohan jugged.

The next night I went out and, sure enough, there was my brave Monohan lined up against the wall with the inevitable grip. I walked up to him and said:

"Look here, you big stiff, you've been round here every night now for some time looking for trouble," and with that I let fly one for his jaw. A rumpus followed, the cops jumped in, and Monohan was dragged off down the street on his way to jail, bellowing like a mad bull. Then I dashed into the theatre and out on the stage. Stepping to the footlights, I said:

"There has been a request that I box a Mr. Mike Monohan of the Gas House. If Mr. Monohan is in the house will he please step forward." I repeated the request and then went on with some other chap.

Well, when Monohan got out of jail there was no quieting him. I simply had to take him on. The place was packed. It was the last night of the show. Monohan went down into the dressing room and Daly began to work on him, repeating all the stuff that he had fed to previous victims. At last Daly came up on the stage and said:

"Jim, I've tried every way I know to throw a scare into the fellow, but he won't be frightened. He's down there now whistling Irish tunes. He seems to think you'll be lucky to stay four rounds with him.

I went up to Brady and said:

"Now, Bill, I'm going to knock this fellow out in four rounds if the four rounds take four hours. Let the first round go five minutes, the next ten minutes and so on. The crowd won't mind. They'll like a lot of boxing, and Monohan will be too busy to know that time is being lengthened on him."

I told Brady to signal me ten seconds before the first round was up, as I had an idea that I wanted to carry out.

The bell rang, and Monohan rushed at me with all the fury of a Bengal tiger. His right hand came flying across for my jaw and I put up my left to block it. I thought the blow had broken my arm. I never felt such power behind a punch! Then I started to dance in and around and away from Mr. Mike Monahan of the Gas House.

Mike never stopped. The faster he came the faster I ducked and sidled and slid away. Then I saw that Mike's arms were getting heavy. He wanted to drop them to his sides and rest them. I knew he was getting tired. No man in the world could stand the pace he was going. But every time he attempted to drop his hands I feinted and up they would come. Up to now I hadn't struck a blow. The five minutes seemed like five hours.

Suddenly, I got the office from Brady. "Ten seconds" he seemed to nod. That was my cue. With all the power at my command I ripped a left hook to his jaw. Mike quivered. Quick as a flash I sent a right to the other side of his head and several to his wind. Then the bell rang. I ran quickly to my corner and took several deep breaths. Then I turned and watched Monohan staggering slowly toward his corner. I had accomplished my purpose. The ginger was all out of him now.

Just as he started to sit down I nodded to Brady and he yelled, "Time!" Poor Monohan! He staggered forward and went at it again. He started up his speeding, but not with the vim of the first round. I worked him around as fast as I could. But his arms were dead tired. I watched this like a hawk. Then I'd feint and call him an A. P. A., and that would start him all over again.

But he was like an old clock now, simply running down and going slower and slower. I waited for another chance and I sent a right crashing against his jaw. He reached out and clinched. Like grim death Mike Monohan clung to me. He was tired, groggy, glassy-eyed and "all in." But he was foxy. He had sense enough to know that the minute he let go it was all off with him. So just as the referee pried his way in between us to break us, Monohan said in a husky voice:

"I THINK YOU'D BETTER STOP IT BEFORE WE KILL ONE ANOTHER."

At a June Wedding—Time—High Noon. Place—Fashionable Church.

MISS DE RHUBBER—After sending Myrtle such a swell present she might have arranged to have me seated with the relatives instead of with these rubes back here.

MISS JINJER—Why do people get married in June? I'll bet it is 100 degrees in here. What a scrumpy lot of decorations.

MISS DE RHUBBER—It's a good thing he's got money. Myrtle's father will go broke on this thing.

MISS JINJER—Bet you she leaves him and goes back home in six months.

MISS DE RHUBBER—If I had such a lot of frumps for relatives as she's got I'd have a quiet home wedding.

MISS JINJER—Seen the presents?

MISS DE RHUBBER—Yes, his people gave them a deed to a house. Her father gave her a check. Bet you the check comes back marked "no funds."

MISS JINJER—And the house is probably a portable bungalow.

BRIDE'S MOTHER—For heaven's sake, Myrtle, don't look so happy; do you want everyone to think you're tickled to death to get him.

BRIDE—You've been grinning ever since we were engaged.

BRIDE'S FATHER—Suffering mackerel, how they rob you—flowers and music and caterer, ye gods. I'll sink five thousand in this mess.

BRIDE'S MOTHER—You ain't had five thousand since I knew you.

BRIDE—Hush, for goodness sake don't fight now; some of Charlie's people will hear you.

BRIDE'S FATHER—Now, when I was married we drove over in a $2 buggy and I paid the parson $5. If you——

BRIDE'S MOTHER—Shut up, I'm not proud of that. Myrtle, do powder your nose, the freckles are showing through, and don't stand on your train, people will think you never wore a train.

BRIDE—I never did; you were too stingy to ever buy me a decent dress.

BRIDE'S MOTHER—I'm sure we did all we could.

GROOM—Gr—great Scott, old man, suppose she's late? Suppose she refuses now, she's so timid.

BEST MAN—Buck up, you ass, you've got into this mess and you've got to go through with it.

GROOM—But—but which side do I kneel on?

BEST MAN—The outside! Here, take a little nip of this to brace you up.

GROOM—Wish I could, but she might smell it. Is my collar all right? How do I look? Have you got the ring? Dash you, if you lose that ring. How——

BEST MAN—Look here, Charlie, you're in a blue funk, you're so rattled you sound like a box of pills. I'll show you where to stand, and I've got the ring. When I slip it to you don't drop it, for heaven's sake, and don't forget which pocket you put it in, and don't try to put it on the minister's finger the way Bill Mason did.

CATERER—Cheap lot, only giving me $3 per head. I won't make over $2 each on this.

MUSICIANS—Why don't they start? I'll charge 'em extra for this delay.

CLERGYMAN (to himself)—He's got wads of money; his fee ought to be a check with three figures on it.

USHERS—Wonder what he'll give us? I hate stick pins.

GROOM'S MOTHER—I am so mortified. Look at Myrtle's father, he's actually wearing a tuxedo.

GROOM'S FATHER—To think my son should be such a chump as to get married, and only twenty-eight.

GROOM'S MOTHER—You were only twenty-four——

GROOM'S FATHER—Dash it all, do you suppose I want my boy to be a big fool just because I was?

GROOM'S MOTHER—I wish he had picked a girl good enough for him.

BRIDE—How does the veil hang? Is there enough powder on my face? I feel like a boiled lobster, and I ought to look pale.

BRIDESMAID—No, you ought to blush just a little.

BRIDE—Think so? Well, just a dab of rouge; not much.

BRIDESMAID—Now, Myrtle, don't let your hand shake. Hold it steady or he may put the ring on your thumb. Keep your nerve.

BRIDE—Nerve? I'm all nerve. The only thing I'm worrying about is that Charlie will get cold feet. They say men are always scared purple at their own weddings.

MISS DE RHUBBER—Look at that ribbon down the aisles. Slaziest stuff. Bet you it didn't cost nine cents a yard.

MISS JINGER—They say he broke $40 worth of cut glass at his bachelor supper last night.

MISS DE RHUBBER—They won't go to Europe on their trip; they'll go to his relatives out in Chicago.

MISS JINJER—Well, she's the oldest bride we've had for a century. Says she's only twenty-two. My goodness, she was in primary school before Charlie was born.

MUSICIANS—"Tom, tum—tetum."
CLERGYMAN—Do you?
GROOM—I—I—yes, sir—I mean, I do.
BRIDE (firmly)—I DO!
GROOM'S MOTHER—Humph!
GROOM'S FATHER—Blank-e-ty-blank!
BEST MAN—Whew!
BRIDESMAID—Tee-hee.
BRIDE'S MOTHER—Boo-hoo!
BRIDE'S FATHER—Thank heaven!

TEN little militants, marching in a line,
One fooled with dynamite, and then there were nine.

Nine little militants, brimming o'er with hate,
One slapped Her Majesty, and then there were eight.

Eight little militants, caring nought for Heaven,
One fired the House of Lords, and then there were seven.

Seven little militants, with anarchistic tricks,
One tampered with a bomb, and then there were six.

Six little militants, very much alive,
One poisoned six M. P.'s, and then there were five.

Five little militants, behind a prison door,
One scorned a dozen meals, and then there were four.

Four little militants, as spiteful as can be,
One held her breath a week, and then there were three.

Three little militants, thinking what to do,
One tried to throw an axe, and then there were two.

Two little militants, marching with a gun,
Carried it the wrong side up, and then there was one.

One little militant, tired out with strife,
Met a very nice young man, and she became a wife.

Mace Millibridge and Mary Waters ain't on speakin' terms no more. When they wuz out on his motersickle her skirt got caught and came nigh off her. She made him go to a corner of a rail fence and stand with his back to her. While he wuz there Herb Drake's buck sheep went agin him.

Sumtimes a woman meanin' well will do things that makes a feller mad. Sunday afternoon when I woke up I found that Mirandy hed put one of her open-work stockins over my face for a muskeeter nettin'.

Joe Plum hez had his wooden leg painted flesh color, so he kin wear them silk socks what are made mostly of daylite.

Don't it beat all what slaves we git to our likens and dislikens. My Mirandy heard of a way of makin' blackberry jam by takin' the seeds out. The stuff tasted so unlifelike that she put them back in, and it took me a hull hour to git them all stirred in jest rite.

When I wuz standin' on the corner of Main street and Sassafras avenue Saturday nite with my legs apart bracin' agin the crowd, I felt sumthing go atwixt them and I shut down on it. Then I felt a yank and a woman screamed erbout losin' sumthin. When I looked down I hed her baby atwixt my knees what she hed pushed there in one of them push carts what she hed.

Mrs. Perkins wuz in a serious condition fer a while Saterday, and her house nigh burned down. She hez a wart on the end of her tung, and when she run tew a nabor's to ask them fer help, the thing got caught atwixt her broken tooth and ernuther one and all she could say was "Thiz, thiz!" They thot she wanted them to keep still and they didn't move for some littel spell.

Let Art Be Free

Down with Restrictive Tariff On Works of Enlightenment.

ART should be placed on the free list.

There should be no duty on the products of genius.

A protective tariff doesn't even protect our own struggling artists. In vain they gnash their teeth at the sight of pictures by the pauper artists of Europe selling at auction for a couple of hundred thou.

Even with the aid of the tariff, what infant artist here could auction a "pic" for more than the price of a mere magazine cover?

Were art free, every home in the land, be it never so humble, could have a colored copy of "September Morn" hanging over the washtubs.

Free art, by heck! or bust the party.

PRETZELS

A COMMISSIONER REYNOLDS, of Kansas City has decided that a pretzel isn't food.

A pretzel is something nobler than mere food.

It is a contortionist cracker.

It is the glad symbol of free lunch; the emblem of the foaming brew.

Food! A pretzel is the swastika of America's grandest institution.

If Art Were Free.

Suburban Notes

There are more trains on the Summer timetables, but they don't seem to run so often.

In clipping a hedge, or a newspaper, it is advisable to save the clippings for future reference. The most convenient way is to paste them in a book.

Dandelion makes a delicious salad. To make dandelion salad: Lettuce, onions, tomatoes, French dressing (no dandelion).

Remarkable natural history fact: birds build every Spring, although they are the only suburbanites without a building and loan association.

Did You Know That--

SHARK AND MAN.

TO THE EDITOR—We think a man-eating shark is a horrible monster, but nobody seems to think ill of a shark-eating man. I consider this grossly unfair to the shark. Further, I do not believe a shark would eat a man anyway.

But Not Sure.

DINAH was a product of New Orleans, a big, plump "yaller gal," who could cook the finest dinners for miles around. One day a new butler appeared upon the scene, and Dinah's mistress noticed that she took a great interest in the man. At last her mistress could stand her curiosity no longer and asked:

"Dinah, do you know that new man?"

Dinah took another long and scrutinizing look and then slowly and reminiscently replied:

"Well, I dunno, Miss Alice; but I think he was ma fust husband!"

Wee Bit o' Foresight.

DONALD was leaving his native village for parts unknown. Sandy his friend, invited all the friends and neighbors to the home to give Donald a royal send-off. As is customary at these gatherings, liquid refreshments were served without stint.

About 9 o'clock Sandy noticed Donald going round bidding the guests good-bye. "You're no goin' yet, Donald?" he said in surprise.

"Na, I'm no goin' yet," answered Donald, "but I thoct I'd bid 'em all good-bye while I knew 'em."

He Was All Right.

A KENTUCKY colonel of the old school had made a proud boast that he hadn't drunk a glass of water in twenty years.

One day as he was riding to Nashville on the old Louisville and Nashville the train was wrecked while crossing a bridge and plunged into the river. They pulled the colonel out with a boat-hook, and when they got him on shore one of his friends rushed up, crying:

"Colonel! Are you hurt?"

"No!" he snorted. "Never swallowed a drop!"

Not a Futurist.

AMONG the bewildered and in some cases indignant spectators gathered at the recent Futurist exhibition of painting and sculpture in Chicago was a young man from Springfield, in charge of a cousin who is "strong for" the new movement in art.

The youth remained silent during the view and the subsequent explanations of the new idea given him by his cousin.

"Well," said the latter finally, "you don't seem particularly enthusiastic about them. What do you think?"

"Think!" growled the youth from Springfield. "Why, I've got two aunts at home that can knit better pictures than those."

SMILES

He Felt Like His Charge.

"Have you ever made a serious mistake in putting up a prescription?" asked the customer of the apothecary.

"Never but once," said the drug man. "I charged a man thirty cents instead of a dollar and a half."

No Joke.

"We've got a great road now," said an enthusiastic New York, New Haven and Hartford official to his friend. "We've got it double-tracked clear through from Boston to New York."

"H'm," said the friend. "I don't see what you want a double track for. You can't keep your trains on one."

Much Easier.

"After I wash my face I look in the mirror to see if it's clean. Don't you?" asked the sweet little girl of Bobbie.

"Don't have to," said Bobbie; "I just look at the towel."

Self Taught-ured.

The farmer's son came home looking as if he had been through a tornado. His father inquired the cause. The son replied:

"It's that durn correspondence school again. I got a letter from the Sophomores telling me to haze myself."

A Clincher.

The American chorus girl, who is now invading London with great success, is nothing if not up-to-date.

"You are behind the times over here," said a pink and pretty American show girl. "Why, I notice that 'Twelfth Night' is playing in one of the Strand theaters, and we had that two years ago on Broadway."

Couldn't Go With Him.

A well-known lawyer in Boston had a horse that always stopped and refused to cross the mill-dam bridge leading out of the city. No whipping, no urging, would induce him to cross without stopping. So he advertised him:

"To be sold, for no other reason than that the owner wants to go out of town."

No Place for Him.

"Wish to leave, Parkins? Why, you only came yesterday."

"Yes, marm. In engaging I thought you was a sparragrass and champagne gentry. But when I 'ears from the cook last night that you eat persaters, cabbages, carrots, and such like second-hand vegetables, and drinks beer, I sees there ain't nothing esthetic in it, and I resigns my office, so to speak."

A Recruit.

"A bad mess," declared the junior partner. "Lot of urgent mail to be answered and the typewriter has just left."

"The office boy is always fooling around that machine," suggested the senior partner. "Put him in now and let's see what he can do as a pinch hitter."

Needed It.

"Yes," said the fair young thing, "that punch you have just tasted is made from a recipe that has been treasured in the family for centuries. The earliest authent'c record we have of it was in the lifetime of my great-great - ever - so - great - grandfather, whose suit of armor stands in the hall."

"If he drank much of that punch," observed the young man, who had had two glasses of it, "he must have wished he was wearing that armor on his inside instead of his outside."

Precaution.

"Why, Bridget, you surely don't consider these windows washed?" said the lady of the house, reproachfully.

"Sure, I washed 'em nicely on the inside, mum, so we can look out," replied Bridget, "but I intintionally lift thim a little dirty on the outside, so thim ignorant Jones children nixt door couldn't look in."

Costly Lesson.

"Never write letters, young man, that you'll regret in after-life."

"You speak as from experience?"

"I do. In early correspondence with her who is now my wife I signed myself 'Your obedient servant.'"

Post for Every One.

Most blind and deaf people are not nearly so sensitive about their afflictions as we think they are. The Deaf Times, for instance, tells this story:

The railway chairman was explaining his reorganization of the staff, and came to Spriggs.

The chief shareholder gasped. "Spriggs! What on earth can he do? Why, he is so deaf that he can't hear thunder! What post have you given him?"

"I think you will agree," returned the chairman, stiffly, "that the directors understand their business thoroughly. Mr Spriggs will attend each day and hear all complaints from passengers!"

A Gentle Hint.

"Mandy," said her mistress, "that beau of yours shouldn't wear white clothes. He is so black it makes him appear all the blacker. Why don't you give him a hint?"

"Lord, Miss Sally, you know somethin'!" said Mandy, with animation. "I done give him er hint, but he jes natterly ain't got sense ernuff ter take it."

"Perhaps you didn't make it strong enough."

"No'm, thet's right, maybe I didn't. I jes looks at him right hard, an' I says: 'Nigger, you sho do look like a black snake crawlin' out o' cream, you do!'—thet's whut I says ter him, Miss Sally."

The Artful Sportsman.

A gentleman who had the reputation of being a bad shot invited some of his friends to dine with him. Before dinner he showed them a target painted on the barn door with a bullet in the bull's-eye. He said he had shot this at a distance of 500 yards.

During the dinner one of the guests asked him how he managed to fire such an excellent shot.

"Well," said he, "I shot the bullet at the door at a distance of 500 yards and then I painted the target around it."

Don't Make Good.

"You look sweet enough to kiss," says the impressed man.

"So many gentlemen tell me that," coyly answers the fair girl.

"Ah! That should make you happy."

"But they merely say that," she repines. "They merely tell me the facts in the case and never prove their statements."

Doctor's Orders.

"My husband is just getting over a spell of sickness and I want to buy him a shirt," said Mrs. Binks.

"Yes, ma'am," replied the clerk. "Would you want something in a stiff bosom?"

"No, sir," said Mrs. Binks. "The doctor says he must avoid anything with starch in it."

No Facilities.

"They say that Cupid strikes the match that sets the world aglow. But where does Cupid strike the match? That's what I'd like to know."

Under the White Flag.

The Sultan (cordially to King Nicholas)—Have a bier, Your Highness?

King Nicholas—Thanks, Sully, old man; but if you don't mind I'd prefer a whack at a little of your Sublime Porte.

Did She See?

A woman was discussing the English language with Rudyard Kipling.

"Don't you think it strange, Mr. Kipling," said the woman, with superior wisdom, "that sugar is the only word in the English language where an 's' and a 'u' come together and are pronounced 'sh'?"

Mr. Kipling's eyes twinkled as he answered: "Sure."

Or of Whisky.

The fondness of American men for tacking official titles on to their names is well known.

"I once," says a prominent United States official, "met a man who called himself Judge Green, and I ventured to ask him if he were a United States judge or a circuit court judge.

"'Neither,' he told me. 'I'm a judge of hosses!'"

Valuable Assistance.

A country visitor at a New York hotel, having a dread of pickpockets, went to the clerk and handed him a hundred-dollar bill to be put in the safe.

Asking for it next day, he was thunderstruck when the functionary to whom he had given the money coolly denied any recollection of the matter. Thereupon the countryman went to a lawyer.

"Get another hundred-dollar bill," said the lawyer, "and go, accompanied by a friend, back to the hotel; apologize to the clerk for your mistake; say it was a defect of memory; attribute it to drink or absent-mindedness; deposit the second hundred dollars in the presence of your friend, and come back to me."

The mystified ruralist obeyed his instructions to the very letter.

"Now," said the lawyer, "go back alone to the clerk and ask him for the hundred dollars. Knowing that your friend saw him receive it, he will give back the second hundred-dollar bill. Then take your friend with you the next day, approach the clerk, ask him boldly for that hundred dollars, and, as there was no witness to your receipt of the second bill, he will be forced to return the first also."

The ruse proved completely successful.

The lawyer sent his bill the next day. It was for a fee of one hundred dollars.

Like the Dog.

Peck—You will never get the dog to mind you, my dear.

Mrs. Peck—I shall, with patience. You were just as troublesome yourself at first.

Please remember that this free offer involves absolutely no obligation on your part, and there is nothing whatsoever for you to pay, and nothing whatsoever for you to buy in any way, unless you should decide at some time in the future that you would like to try one of my mechanical VITALIZERS (described below), but that rests entirely with yourself. Over a million of these little books have now been sent to men who wrote for them, as I want you to do, and who live in all quarters of the globe. SANDEN, AUTHOR.

MANLY, VIGOROUS MEN RULE THE WORLD.

In reference to manly strength, I believe it is now more generally acknowledged than ever before that the manly man stands back of all that makes for progress, development and achievement in the world, a truth which any of us can easily verify if we look about us with impartial eyes.

As a matter of fact, the man who is debilitated, unstrung and enervated can not, for perfectly obvious reasons, expect to approach those real and manful attainments which seem but a natural and easy accomplishment for him whose nerve force, brain power and manly strength are perfectly normal. Hence, while we acknowledge the debilitated, weakened man to be handicapped in every walk of life where real manhood counts, yet it would indeed be cruel of me to here so state the fact in public print were I not of the honest opinion that there is every hope for the unmanly man to restore himself to a state of health and vigor, if he but clear his mind of abnormal fear and then make a fair, square effort to redeem himself.

There are two specimens of humanity for which I have no earthly use. One is the man who, though now strong and vital, yet plunges into dissipation and excess with the certain knowledge of his unmanly fate. The other is the man who, though knowingly debilitated and enervated, makes no effort to get away from his life of dissipation and wrong practices. As a matter of fact, there is no hope for either of these unfortunates. But for him who acknowledges his errors, who may come to me and say, "I have paid the penalty of my past follies, but I am THROUGH with my life of dissipation, and I am going to make a manly effort to restore myself," to such a man, I care not what his physical condition may be, I can say in all truthfulness, "You, my friend, are on the right road to new strength and new manhood," for he really is, and there is no doubt about it.

I make a little appliance that I call a VITALIZER, which I designed to aid just such men who seek manly strength. I am not offering this VITALIZER here for sale, but merely suggest that you, reader, take the opportunity to learn all about what this little appliance is doing to-day everywhere throughout the world; then, if in the future you want to use one yourself and will so write me, I will gladly make some liberal proposition whereby you may have one to try. The VITALIZER is fully described in one section of the free book which the coupon below entitles you to.

The VITALIZER is made up in a very light form, weighing only several ounces, and you wear it on your body all night. It generates a great, soft, pleasant FORCE which I call VIGOR, and which flows in a continuous stream into your nerves, organs, blood and muscles while you sleep. I am satisfied in my own mind that I have access to a great POWER in this little VITALIZER which in the future will be more and more relied upon all over the world in the treatment of debilities and nerve weaknesses.

With special attachments which carry the FORCE of the VITALIZER to any part of the body, it may be used by women as well as men for the treatment of rheumatism, kidneys, liver, stomach, bladder disorders, nervousness, lack of energy, etc. Therefore, please send for the book to-day, or, if you happen to live in or near this city, I should be very glad to see you in person. Office hours, 9 to 6; Sunday, 10 to 1.

WHAT THE FREE BOOK TEACHES YOU

The little free illustrated book of special private information, referred to above, is meant really to be a self guide for all men through the years before and after marriage and onward to a ripe old age. It is written in perfectly plain language, entirely free from technical terms, so that any one may easily grasp the full power of its good advice from two or three careful readings. It attempts to point out a safe road to new manhood or new manly strength, and as such is dedicated to mankind generally. One part of this book fully describes my little VITALIZER referred to above.

Remember, as soon as the coupon below is received I agree to forward to you one copy of this illustrated booklet, absolutely free of charge and in a plain, sealed envelope, so that it will come to you privately, just as you receive any sealed mail.

Just pack it—that's all! The freezer will do the rest. No crank to turn—no hard work—no dasher to clean—no glass to break—no hoops to fall off.

Be Wise! Make Your Own Ice Cream

Of course, you know that home-made ice creams, sherbets or ices are superior from every viewpoint. They are always sweet, pure and wholesome; there is a flavor and genuine goodness about them that is not found in the general run of factory products. Besides that, when you make your own preparations you know that the ingredients are always pure, and that the can is clean and sanitary. The main reason why ice cream is made in but comparatively few homes, is the work and bother connected with the old-fashioned crank freezer. That is one reason why the arrival of

will be hailed with delight by every one who is fond of ice creams, etc., because it eliminates the tedious turning of the crank entirely, and produces creams, sherbets and ices that will make your mouth water. That is one reason, but there are many others.

DON'T YOU KNOW that the enjoyment of a dish largely depends upon the manner in which it is served? Could you imagine a daintier and more appetizing manner of serving ice creams than provided for by the "Ice-Kist?"

THE SPY— By J. Fenimore Cooper

"Harvey opened his wallet and invited his companion to partake of the coarse food it contained."

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

AT that period of the War of the American Revolution when New York is in British hands, Henry Wharton, a young British officer recklessly visits his father and sisters at their country home in the neutral ground of Westchester County. Though warned by Harvey Birsch, a peddler, supposed to be a British spy, he lingers and is captured by Virginia dragoons commanded by Major Dunwoodie, who loves his sister, Frances; Henry Wharton is paroled in charge of his family. At the house of Harvey Birch, which is watched by agents of both armies, the peddler's old father lies dying. The supposed British spy ventures within to see his dying parent, only to be forced by a band of marauders to give up his rumored hoard of gold. It is English guineas. Harvey is given up to Dunwoodie and is condemned to the gallows. He escapes at night, miraculously. Henry Wharton is tried as a British spy and condemned. He, too, escapes from prison with the aid of Harvey Birch. Frances Wharton finds him in the secret hut of the mysterious but powerful Harper, who assures her of his safety.

The Hunted Brother Plays Cupid.

FRANCES and her brother, who thought his companion had passed through the door, continued conversing on the latter's situation for several minutes, when the former urged the necessity of expedition on his part, in order to precede Dunwoodie, from whose sense of duty they knew they had no escape. The captain took out his pocketbook and wrote a few lines with his pencil; then folding the paper, he handed it to his sister.

"Frances," he said, "you have this night proved yourself to be an incomparable woman. As you love me, give that unopened to Dunwoodie, and remember that two hours may save my life."

"I will—I will; but why delay? Why not fly and improve these precious moments?"

"Your sister says well, Captain Wharton," exclaimed Harvey, who had re-entered unseen; "we must go at once. Here is food to eat, as we travel."

"But who is to see this fair creature in safety?" cried the captain. "I can never desert my sister in such a place as this."

"Leave me! leave me!" said Frances; "I can descend as I came up. Do not doubt me; you know not my courage nor my strength."

"I have not known you, dear girl, it is true; but now, as I learn your value, can I quit you here? Never, never!"

"Captain Wharton," said Birch, throwing open the door, "you can trifle with your own lives, if you have many to spare; I have but one, and must nurse it. Do I go alone, or not?"

"Go, go, dear Henry," said Frances, embracing him; "go; remember our father; remember Sarah." She waited not for his answer, but gently forced him through the door, and closed it with her own hands.

For a short time there was a warm debate between Henry and the peddler; but the latter finally prevailed, and the breathless girl heard the successive plunges, as they went down the sides of the mountain at a rapid rate.

Immediately after the noise of their departure had ceased, Harper reappeared. He took the arm of Frances in silence and led her from the hut. The way seemed familiar to him; for, ascending to the ledge above them, he led his companion across the tableland tenderly, pointing out the little difficulties in their route, and cautioning her against injury.

"You have this night saved your brother, Miss Wharton. It would not be proper for me to explain why there are limits to my ability to serve him, but if you can detain the horse for two hours, he is assuredly safe. After what you have already done, I can believe you equal to any duty. God has denied to me children, young lady, but if it had been His blessed will that my marriage should not have been childless, such a treasure as yourself would I have asked from His mercy. But you are my child; all who dwell in this broad land are my children, and my care; and take the blessing of one who hopes yet to meet you in happier days."

He then mounted his horse and lifting his hat rode toward the back of the mountain, descending at the same time and was soon hid by the trees. Frances sprang forward with a lightened heart, and taking the first path that led downward, in a few minutes she reached the plain in safety. While busied in stealing through the meadows toward the house, the noise of horse approaching startled her, and she felt how much more was to be apprehended from man, in some situations, than from solitude. Hiding her form in the angle of a fence near the road, she remained quiet for a moment and watched their passage.

A small party of dragoons, whose dress was different from the Virginians, passed at a brisk trot. They were followed by a gentleman, enveloped in a large cloak, whom she at once knew to be Harper. Behind him rode a black in livery, and two youths in uniform brought up the rear. Instead of taking the road that led by the encampment, they turned short to the left and entered the hills.

Wondering who this unknown but powerful friend of her brother could be, Frances glided across the fields, and using due precautions in approaching the dwelling, regained her residence undiscovered and in safety.

It wanted yet an hour to the termination of the shortest period that the peddler had fixed as the time necessary to effect his escape. Even Harper, powerful and well disposed as he acknowledged himself to be, had laid great stress upon the importance of detaining the Virginians during that hour. She, however, had not time to rally her thoughts, before Dunwoodie entered one door, as Miss Peyton, with the readiness of female instinct, retired through another.

The countenance of Peyton was flushed, and an air of vexation and disappointment pervaded his manner.

"'Twas imprudent, Frances; nay, it was unkind," he cried, throwing himself in a chair, "to fly at the very moment that I had assured him of safety! I can almost persuade myself that you delight in creating points of difference in our feelings and duties."

"In our duties there may very possibly be a difference," returned his mistress, approaching and leaning her slender form against the wall; "but not in our feelings, Peyton. You must certainly rejoice in the escape of Henry!"

"There was no danger impending. He had the promise of Harper; and it is a word never to be doubted. Oh! Frances! Frances! had you known the man, you would never have distrusted his assurance; nor would you have again reduced me to this distressing alternative."

"What alternative?" asked Frances, pitying his emotions deeply, but eagerly seizing upon every circumstance to prolong the interview.

"What alternative! Am I not compelled to spend this night in the saddle to recapture your brother, when I had thought to lay my head on its pillow, with the happy consciousness of having contributed to his release? You make me seem your enemy; I who would cheerfully shed the last drop of blood in your service. I repeat, Frances, it was rash; it was unkind; it was a sad, sad mistake."

She bent toward him and timidly took one of his hands, while with the other she gently removed the curls from his burning brow.

"Why go at all, dear Peyton?" she asked. "You have done much for your country, and she cannot exact such a sacrifice as this at your hand."

"Frances! Miss Wharton!" exclaimed the youth, springing on his feet, and pacing the floor with a cheek that burnt through its brown covering, and an eye that sparkled with wounded integrity; "it is not my country, but my honor, that requires the sacrifice. Has he not fled from a guard of my own corps? But for this I might have been spared the blow! But if the eyes of the Virginians are blinded to deception and artifice, their horses are swift of foot, and their sabres keen. We shall see, before to-morrow's sun, who will presume to hint that the beauty of the sister furnished a mask to conceal the brother! Yes, yes; I should like, even now," he continued, laughing bitterly, "to hear the villain who would dare to surmise that such treachery existed!"

"Stop! Dunwoodie, I conjure you," cried Frances, gasping for breath, as she noticed that the hand of the clock still wanted many minutes to the desired hour; "before you go on your errand of fastidious duty, read this note that Henry has left for you, and which, doubtless, he thought he was writing to the friend of his youth."

"Frances, I excuse your feelings; but the time will come when you will do me justice."

"That time is now," she answered, extending her hand, unable any longer to feign a displeasure that she did not feel.

"Where got you this note?" exclaimed the youth, glancing his eyes over its contents. "Poor Henry, you are indeed my friend! If any one wishes me happiness, it is you!"

"He does, he does," cried Frances eagerly; "he wishes you every happiness; believe what he tells you; every word is true."

"I do believe him, lovely girl, and he refers me to you for its confirmation. Would that I could trust equally to your affections!"

"You may, Peyton," said Frances, looking up with innocent confidence toward her lover.

"Then read for yourself, and verify your words," interrupted Dunwoodie, holding the note toward her.

Frances received it in astonishment, and read the following:

"Life is too precious to be trusted to uncertainties. I leave you, Peyton, unknown to all but Caesar, and I recommend him to your mercy. But there is a care that weighs me to the earth. Look at my aged and infirm parent. He will be reproached for the supposed crime of his son. Look at those helpless sisters that I leave behind me without a protector. Prove to me that you love us all. Let the clergyman whom you will bring with you unite you this night to Frances, and become at once brother, son and husband."

The paper fell from the hands of Frances, and she endeavored to raise her eyes to the face of Dunwoodie, but they sank abashed to the floor.

"Am I worthy of this confidence? Will you send me out this night, to meet my own brother? or will it be the officer of Congress in quest of the officer of Britain?"

"And would you do less of your duty because I am your wife, Major Dunwoodie? in what degree would it better the condition of Henry?"

"Henry, I repeat, is safe. The word of Harper is his guarantee; but I will show the world a bridegroom," continued the youth, perhaps deceiving himself a little, "who is equal to the duty of arresting the brother of his bride."

"And will the world comprehend this refinement?" said Frances, with a musing air, that lighted a thousand hopes in the bosom of her lover. In fact, the temptation was mighty. Indeed, there seemed no other way to detain Dunwoodie until the fatal hour had elapsed. The words of Harper himself, who had so lately told her that openly he could do but little for Henry, and that everything depended upon gaining time, were deeply engraved upon her memory. Perhaps there was also a fleeting thought of the possibility of an eternal separation from her lover, should he proceed and bring back her brother to punishment. It is difficult at all times to analyze human emotions, and they pass through the sensitive heart of a woman with the rapidity and nearly with the vividness of lightning.

"Why do you hesitate, dear Frances?" cried Dunwoodie, who was studying her varying countenance; "a few minutes might give me a husband's claim to protect you."

Frances grew giddy. She turned an anxious eye to the clock, and the hand seemed to linger over its face, as if with intent to torture her.

"Speak, Frances," murmured Dunwoodie; "may I summon my good kinswoman? determine, for time presses."

She endeavored to reply, but could only whisper something that was inaudible, but which her lover, with the privilege of immemorial custom, construed into assent. He turned and flew to the door, when his mistress recovered her voice:

"Stop, Peyton! I cannot enter into such a solemn engagement with a fraud upon my conscience. I have seen Henry since his escape, and time is all-important to him. Here is my hand; if, with this knowledge of the consequences of delay, you will not reject it, it is freely yours."

"Reject it!" cried the delighted youth; "I take it as the richest gift of Heaven. There is time enough for us all. Two hours will take me through the hills; and by noon, to-morrow, I will return with Washington's pardon for your brother, and Henry will help to enliven our nuptials."

"Then meet me here, in ten minutes," said Frances, greatly relieved by unburthening her mind, and filled with the hope of securing Henry's safety, "and I will return and take those vows which will bind me to you forever."

Dunwoodie paused only to press her once to his bosom and flew to communicate his wishes to the priest.

CHAPTER XIV

An Order from Washington.

Miss Peyton received the avowal of her niece with astonishment and displeasure. Mr. Wharton was too completely a convert to the doctrine of passive obedience and non-resistance to withstand any solicitation from an officer of Dunwoodie's influence in the rebel armies; and the maid returned to the apartment accompanied by her father and aunt, at the expiration of the time that she had fixed. Dunwoodie and the clergymen were already there. Frances, silently, and without the affectation of reserve, placed in his hand the wedding ring of her own mother, and after some little time spent in arranging Mr. Wharton and herself, Miss Peyton suffered the ceremony to proceed.

The clock stood directly before the eyes of Frances, and she turned many an anxious glance at the dial; but the solemn language of the priest soon caught her attention, and her mind became intent upon the vows she was uttering. The ceremony was quickly over, and as the clergyman closed the words of benediction, the clock told the hour of nine. This was the time that Harper had deemed so important, and Frances felt as if a mighty load was at once removed from her heart.

Dunwoodie folded her in his arms, saluted the mild aunt again and again, and shook Mr. Wharton and the divine repeatedly by the hands. In the midst of the felicitation, a tap was heard at the door. It was opened, and Mason appeared.

"We are in the saddle," said the lieutenant, "and, with your permission, I will lead on; as you are so well mounted, you can overtake us at your leisure."

"Yes, yes, my good fellow; march," cried Dunwoodie, gladly seizing an excuse to linger; "I will reach you at the first halt."

The subaltern retired to execute these orders; he was followed by Mr. Wharton and the divine.

The noise of a horseman was heard approaching the house, and Dunwoodie was yet taking leave of his bride and her aunt, when an officer was shown into the room by his own man.

The gentleman wore the dress of an aid-de-camp, and the major at once knew him to be one of the military family of Washington.

"Major Dunwoodie," he said, after bowing to the ladies, "the commander-in-chief has directed me to give you these orders."

He executed his mission, and, pleading duty, took his leave immediately.

"Here, indeed!" cried the major, "is an unexpected turn in the whole affair; but I understand it; Harper has got my letter, and already we feel his influence."

"Have you news affecting Henry?" cried Frances, springing to his side.

"Listen, and you shall judge."

"Sir—Upon the receipt of this, you will concentrate your squadron, so as to be in front of a covering party which the enemy has sent up in front of his foragers, by ten o'clock to-morrow, on the heights of Croton, where you will find a body of foot to support you. The escape of the English spy has been reported to me, but his arrest is unimportant, compared with the duty I now assign you. You will, therefore, recall your men, if any are in pursuit, and endeavor to defeat the enemy forthwith.

"Your obedient servant,

"GEORGE WASHINGTON."

"Thank God!" cried Dunwoodie, "my hands are washed of Henry's recapture; I can now move to my duty with honor."

"And with prudence, too, dear Peyton," said Frances, with a face as pale as death; "remember, Dunwoodie, you leave behind you new claims on your life."

The youth dwelt on her lovely but pallid features with rapture; and, as he folded her to his heart, exclaimed:

"For your sake, I will, lovely innocent!" Frances sobbed a moment on his bosom, and he tore himself from her presence.

The peddler and his companion soon reached the valley and after pausing to listen, and hearing no sounds which announced that pursuers were abroad, they, entered the highway. Acquainted with every step that led through the mountains, and possessed of sinews inured to toil, Birch led the way, with the lengthened strides that were peculiar to the man and his profession; his pack alone was wanting to finish the appearance of his ordinary business air. At times, when they approached one of those little posts held by the American troops, with which the Highlands abounded, he would take a circuit to avoid the sentinels, and plunge fearlessly into a thicket, or ascend a rugged hill, that to the eye seemed impassable. But the peddler was familiar with every turn in their difficult route, knew where the ravines might be penetrated, or where the streams were fordable. In one or two instances, Henry thought that their further progress was absolutely at an end but the ingenuity, or knowledge, of his guide, conquered every difficulty. After walking at a great rate for three hours, they suddenly diverged from the road, which inclined to the east, and held their course directly across the hills, in a due south direction. This movement was made, the peddler informed his companion, in order to avoid the parties who constantly patrolled in the southern entrance of the Highlands, as well as to shorten the distance, by traveling in a straight line. After reaching the summit of a hill, Harvey seated himself by the side of a little run, and opening a wallet that he had slung where his pack was commonly suspended, he invited his comrade to partake of the coarse fare it contained.

"Follow my example, Captain Wharton," said the peddler, commencing his frugal meal; "if the horse have started, it will be more than man can do to head them; and if they have not, work is cut out for them, that will drive all thoughts of you and me from their brains."

"You said yourself, that two hours' detention was all-important to us, and if we loiter here, of what use will be the advantage that we may have already obtained?"

"The time is passed, and Major Dunwoodie thinks little of following two men, when hundreds are waiting for him on the banks of the river."

After completing their repast the peddler resumed his journey.

It was not long before they gained the banks of the Hudson. After searching for a short time under the shore, the peddler discovered a skiff that appeared to be an old acquaintance; and, entering it with his companion, he landed him on the south side of the Croton. Here Birch declared they were in safety, for the royal troops held the Continentals at bay, and the former were out in too great strength for the light parties of the latter to trust themselves below that river on the immediate banks of the Hudson.

CHAPTER XV.

A Fallen Tree of the Revolution.

While the scenes and events that we have recorded were occurring, Captain Lawton led his small party, by slow and wary marches, from the Four Corners to the front of a body of the enemy, where he so successfully manoeuvred, for a short time, as completely to elude all their efforts to entrap him, and yet so disguised his own force as to excite the constant apprehension of an attack from the Americans. This forbearing policy, on the side of the partisan, was owing to positive orders received from his commander. When Dunwoodie left his detachment, the enemy were known to be slowly advancing, and he directed Lawton to hover around them, until his own return, and the arrival of a body of foot, might enable him to intercept their retreat.

The trooper discharged his duty to the letter, but with no little of the impatience that made part of his character when restrained from the attack.

The junction between Lawton and his auxiliaries was made at midnight, and an immediate consultation was held between him and the leader of the foot-soldiers. After listening to the statements of the partisan, who rather despised the prowess of his enemy, the commandant of the party determined to attack the British, the moment daylight enabled him to reconnoitre their position, without waiting for the aid of Dunwoodie and his horse. So soon as this decision was made, Lawton retired from the building where the consultation was held, and rejoined his own small command.

A long roll of the drums from the hill occupied by the British announced that they were on the alert, and a corresponding signal was immediately heard from the Americans. The bugle of the Virginians struck up its martial tones, and in a few moments both the hills, the one held by the royal troops and the other by their enemies, were alive with armed men. Day had begun to dawn, and preparations were making by both parties to give and to receive the attack. In numbers the Americans had greatly the advantage, but in discipline and equipment the superiority was entirely with their enemies. The arrangements for the battle were brief, and by the time the sun had risen the militia moved forward.

Lawton witnessed these operations in silence, nor did he open his mouth until the field was covered with parties of the flying Americans. Then, indeed, he seemed stung with the disgrace thus heaped upon the arms of his country. Spurring Roanoke along the side of the hill, he called to the fugitives in all the strength of his powerful voice.

"Come on, then, my brave friends!" shouted the trooper, turning his horse's head toward the British line, one flank of which was very near him; "come on, and hold your fire until it will scorch their eyebrows."

The men sprang forward and followed his example, neither giving nor receiving a fire until they had come within a very short distance of the enemy. An English sergeant, who had been concealed by a rock, enraged with the audacity of the officer who thus dared their arms, stepped from behind his cover, and, advancing within a few yards of the trooper, levelled his musket.

"Fire and you die!" cried Lawton, spurring his charger, which leaped forward at the instant. The action and the tone of his voice shook the nerves of the Englishman, who drew his trigger with an uncertain aim. Roanoke sprang with all his feet from the earth, and, plunging, fell headlong and lifeless at the feet of his destroyer. Lawton kept his feet, standing face to face with his enemy. The latter presented his bayonet and made a desperate thrust at the trooper's heart. The steel of their weapons emitted sparks of fire, and the bayonet flew fifty feet in the air. At the next moment its owner lay a quivering corpse.

"Come on!" shouted the trooper, as a body of English appeared on the rock and threw in a close fire; "come on!" he repeated, and brandished his sabre fiercely. Then his gigantic form fell backward, like a majestic pine yielding to the axe; but still, as he slowly fell, he continued to wield his sabre, and once more the deep tones of his voice were heard uttering, "Come on!"

The advancing Americans paused aghast, and, turning, they abandoned the field to the royal troops.

A thundering sound of horses' feet came rolling along the road which led near the place where Lawton lay, and directly the whole body of Virginians appeared, with Dunwoodie at their head. The news of the captain's fate had reached him; for the instant that he saw the body he halted the squadron, and, dismounting, approached the spot. The countenance of Lawton was not in the least distorted, but the angry frown which had lowered over his brow during the battle was fixed even in death. His frame was composed, and stretched as in sleep. Dunwoodie took hold of his hand, and gazed a moment in silence; his own dark eye kindled, and the paleness which had overspread his features was succeeded by a spot of deep red in either cheek.

"With his own sword will I avenge him!" he cried, endeavoring to take the weapon from the hand of Lawton; but the grasp resisted his utmost strength. "It shall be buried with him."

The major hastened back to his charger, and led the way in pursuit of the enemy.

The English were formed in a hollow square, which contained their wounded, who were far from numerous, and were marching steadily across a very uneven country as the dragoons approached. The horse charged in column, and were led by Dunwoodie who, burning with revenge, thought to ride through their ranks, and scatter them at a blow. But the enemy knew their own strength too well, and, standing firm, they received the charge on the points of their bayonets. The horses of the Virginians recoiled, and the rear rank of the foot throwing in a close fire, the major, with a few men, fell. The English continued their retreat the moment they were extricated from their assailants; and Dunwoodie, who was severely, but not dangerously wounded, recalled his men from further attempts which, in that stony country, must necessarily be fruitless.

A sad duty remained to be fulfilled. The dragoons retired slowly through the hills, conveying their wounded commander.

Many weeks were gone before the major was restored to sufficient strength to be removed. During those weeks how often did he bless the moment that gave him a right to the services of his beautiful nurse! She hung around his couch with fond attention; administered with her own hands every prescription of the indefatigable physician, and grew each hour in the affections and esteem of her husband.

An order from Washington soon sent the troops into Winter quarters, and permission was given to Dunwoodie to repair to his own plantation, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel, in order to complete the restoration of his health. Captain Singleton made one of the party; and the whole family retired from the active scenes of the war, to the ease and plenty of the major's own estate. Before leaving Fishkill, however, letters were conveyed to them, through an unknown hand, acquainting them with Henry's safety and good health.

It was a happy Winter for Dunwoodie, and smiles once more began to play around the lovely mouth of Frances.

CHAPTER XVI.

Harvey Birch Meets "His Excellency."

The commencement of the following year was passed, on the part of the Americans, in making great preparations, in conjunction with their allies, to bring the war to a close. In the South, Greene and Rawdon made a bloody campaign, that was highly honorable to the troops of the latter, but which, by terminating entirely to the advantage of the former, proved him to be the better general of the two.

At length, as Autumn approached, every indication was given that the final moment had arrived.

The French forces drew near to the royal lines, passing through the neutral ground, and threatened an attack in the direction of King's Bridge, while large bodies of Americans were acting in concert. By hovering around the British posts, and drawing nigh in the Jerseys, they seemed to threaten the royal forces from that quarter also. The preparations partook of the nature of both a siege and a storm. But Sir Henry Clinton, in the possession of intercepted letters from Washington, rested securely within his lines, and cautiously disregarded the solicitations of Cornwallis for succor.

It was at the close of a stormy day in the month of September, that a large assemblage of officers was collected near the door of a building that was situated in the heart of the American troops, who held the Jerseys. The age, the dress and the dignity of deportment of most of these warriors, indicated them to be of high rank; but to one in particular was paid a deference and obedience that announced him to be of the highest. His dress was plain, but it bore the usual military distinctions of command. He was mounted on a noble animal, of a deep bay; and a group of young men, in gayer attire, evidently awaited his pleasure, and did his bidding. Many a hat was lifted as its owner addressed this officer; and when he spoke, a profound attention, exceeding the respect of mere professional etiquette, was exhibited on every countenance.

At length the general raised his own hat and bowed gravely to all around him. The salute was returned, and the party dispersed, leaving the officer without a single attendant, except his body servants and one aid-de-camp. Dismounting, he stepped back a few paces, and for a moment viewed the condition of his horse with the eye of one who well understood the animal, and then, casting a brief but expressive glance at his aid, he retired into the building, followed by that gentleman.

On entering an apartment that was apparently fitted for his reception, he took a seat, and continued for a long time in a thoughtful attitude, like one in the habit of communing much with himself. During this silence the aid-de-camp stood in expectation of his orders. At length the general raised his eyes and spoke in those low, placid tones that seemed natural to him.

The Right of the Srtongest.

That the elemental combative force of a man or woman makes for general progress and a higher individuality if correctly controlled and rightly directed is a demonstrated fact in the history of general civilization. In the individual this force is more strikingly aggressive than in a concrete human endeavor to accomplish a certain purpose.

A complex wrenching of this elemental instinct is the source of Frances Nimmo Green's novel, "The Right of the Strongest," published by Charles Scribner's Sons. The situations are placed in a mountain-girt neighborhood of Alabama inhabited by people whose only title to their lands lies in the pre-emption of their ancestors—the "squatter claim."

An orphan girl "of the peopls" had been taken away from "her own" and educated by a philanthropic man; she is returned to her native acres to educate the little children growing up in inherited ignorance. She isn't happily accepted by the natives because her father had been "an informer" and consequently "hanged to a tree."

Mary Elizabeth doesn't know about this cruel family heritage; she only knows that she isn't popular. Into this section comes a stranger. He plans to get the whole valley for "progressive commercialism." He falls in love with Mary. She reciprocates his devotion, but she discovers that he means to get the lands belonging to her people. She resists his purpose, and has plenty of mountaineer help in the opposition.

With Marshall it is the spirit of conquest more than the accumulation of wealth—the spirit of colossal achievement. But the girl does not comprehend his finer ambitions. She doesn't know what he sacrifices in her behalf until everybody and everything are on the verge of terrible emergencies. In due course the girl realizes her own lack of charity and her own absorption in self-esteem.

There are a dozen thrilling scenes in the closing chapters and splendid evolutions of human nature. The spirit of the mountain people is graphically delineated in quainttly strong personalities. The bright light is turned on the "right of the strongest" in the exercise of the highest type of loyal love.

Scientific Farming.

There's no successful bucking against the fact that it pays to understand and practice the scientific methods of farming in large and small applications of agriculture. A book by C. C. Bowsfield, recently published by Forbes & Co., proves all the theories it presents with statements of actual experiences

Every phase of agriculture is discussed—the raising of grains, vegetables, fruits, poultry, live stock and flowers. The care of the soil is considered at length. Details and figures in profit and loss are given in connection with the raising of all farm products. Moreover, great stress is laid upon making farming an attractive business.

The man who wants to get consistent profit out of a few acres may get highly valuable information by reading this book. The man of the big farm will be interested in ways and means to increase the paying resources of his land. The man who has a city lot may discover the preferable methods of making his lot "pay" in yield and in verdured attractions.

THE SPY :: By J. Fenimore Cooper

"Has the man whom I wished to see arrived, sir?"

"He waits the pleasure of your excellency."

"I will receive him here, and alone, if you please."

The aide bowed and withdrew. In a few minutes the door again opened, and a figure, gliding into the apartment, stood modestly at a distance from the general, without speaking. His entrance was unheard by the officer, who sat gazing at the fire, still absorbed in his own meditations. Several minutes passed, when he spoke to himself in an undertone—

"To-morrow we must raise the curtain and expose our plans. May Heaven prosper them!"

A slight movement made by the stranger caught his ear, and he turned his head and saw that he was not alone. He pointed silently to the fire, toward which the figure advanced, although the multitude of his garments, which seemed more calculated for disguise than comfort, rendered its warmth unnecessary. A second mild and courteous gesture motioned to a vacant chair, but the stranger refused it with a modest acknowledgment. Another pause followed, and continued for some time. At length the officer arose, and opening a desk that was laid upon the table near which he sat, took from it a small, but apparently heavy bag.

"Harvey Birch," he said, turning to the stranger, "the time has arrived when our connection must cease; henceforth and forever we must be strangers."

The peddler dropped the folds of the great coat that concealed his features and gazed for a moment earnestly at the face of the speaker, then, dropping his head upon his bosom, he said, meekly:

"If it be your excellency's pleasure."

"It is necessary. Since I have filled the station which I now hold, it has become my duty to know many men, who, like yourself, have been my instruments in procuring intelligence. You have I trusted more than all; I early saw in you a regard to truth and principle, that, I am pleased to say, has never deceived me—you alone know my secret agents in the city, and on your fidelity depend, not only their fortunes, but their lives."

He paused, as if to reflect in order that full justice might be done to the peddler, and then continued:

"I believe you are one of the very few that I have employed who have acted faithfully to our cause; and, while you have passed as a spy of the enemy, have never given intelligence that you were not permitted to divulge. To me, and to me only of all the world, you seem to have acted with a strong attachment to the liberties of America."

During this address Harvey gradually raised his head from his bosom, until it reached the highest point of elevation; a faint tinge gathered in his cheeks, and, as the officer concluded, it was diffused over his whole countenance in a deep glow, while he stood proudly swelling with his emotions, but with eyes that modestly sought the feet of the speaker.

"It is now my duty to pay you for these services; hitherto you have postponed receiving your reward, and the debt has become a heavy one—I wish not to undervalue your dangers; here are a hundred doubloons; you will remember the poverty of our country, and attribute to it the smallness of your pay."

The peddler raised his eyes to the countenance of the speaker; but, as the other held forth the money, he moved back, as if refusing the bag.

"It is not much for your services and risks, I acknowledge," continued the general, "but it is all that I have to offer; at the end of the campaign it may be in my power to increase it."

"Does your excellency think that I have exposed my life and blasted my character for money?"

"If not for money, what then?"

"What has brought your excellency into the field? For what do you daily and hourly expose your precious life to battle and the halter? What is there about me to mourn, when such men as you risk their all for our country? No, no, no—not a dollar of your gold will I touch; poor America has need of it all!"

The bag dropped from the hand of the officer, and fell at the feet of the peddler, where it lay neglected during the remainder of the interview. The officer looked steadily at the face of his companion, and continued:

"There are many motives which might govern me, that to you are unknown. Our situations are different; I am known as the leader of armies—but you must descend into the grave with the reputation of a foe to your native land. Remember that the veil which conceals your true character can not be raised in years—perhaps never."

Birch again lowered his face, but there was no yielding of the soul in the movement.

"You will soon be old; the prime of your days is already past; what have you to subsist on?"

"These!" said the peddler, stretching forth his hands, that were already embrowned with toil.

"But those may fail you; take enough to secure a support to your age. Remember your risks and cares. I have told you that the characters of men who are much esteemed in life depend on your secrecy; what pledge can I give them of your fidelity?"

"Tell them," said Birch, advancing and unconsciously resting one foot on the bag, "tell them that I would not take the gold!"

The composed features of the officer relaxed into a smile of benevolence, and he grasped the hand of the peddler firmly.

"Now, indeed, I know you; and although the same reasons which have hitherto compelled me to expose your valuable life will still exist, and prevent by openly asserting your character, in private I can always be your friend; fail not to apply to me when in want or suffering, and so long as God giveth to me, so long will I freely share with a man who feels so nobly, and acts so well. If sickness or want should ever assail you, and peace once more smile upon our efforts, seek the gate of him whom you have so often met as Harper, and he will not blush to acknowledge you in his true character."

"It is little that I need in this life," said Harvey; "so long as God gives me health and honest industry, I can never want in this country; but to know that your excellency is my friend is a blessing that I prize more than all the gold of England's treasury."

The officer stood for a few moments in the attitude of intense thought. He then drew to him the desk, and wrote a few lines on a piece of paper and gave it to the peddler.

"That Providence destines this country to some great and glorious fate I must believe, while I witness the patriotism that pervades the bosoms of her lowest citizens," he said. "It must be dreadful to a mind like yours to descend into the grave branded as a foe to liberty; but you already know the lives that would be sacrificed should your real character be revealed. It is impossible to do you justice now, but I fearlessly intrust you with this certificate; should we never meet again, it may be serviceable to your children."

"Children!" exclaimed the peddler, "can I give to a family the infamy of my name?"

The officer gazed at the strong emotion he exhibited with pain, and he made a slight movement toward the gold; but it was arrested by the expression of his companion's face. Harvey saw the intention, and shook his head as he continued more mildly:

"It is, indeed, a treasure that your excellency gives me; it is safe, too. There are men living who could say that my life was nothing to me, compared to your secrets. The paper that I told you was lost I swallowed when taken last by the Virginians. It was the only time I ever deceived your excellency, and it shall be the last; yes, this is, indeed, a treasure to me; perhaps," he continued with a melancholy smile, "it may be known after my death who was my friend; but if it should not, there are none to grieve for me."

"Remember," said the officer, with strong emotion, "that in me you will always have a secret friend; but openly I can not know you."

"I know it, I know it," said Birch; "I knew it when I took the service. 'Tis probably the last time that I shall ever see your excellency. May God pour down his choicest blessing on your head!" He paused, and moved toward the door. The officer followed him with eyes that expressed deep interest. Once more the peddler turned and seemed to gaze on the placid but commanding features of the general with regret and reverence, and then, bowing low, he withdrew.

The armies of America and France were led by their illustrious commander against the enemy under Cornwallis, and terminated a campaign in triumph that had commenced in difficulties. Great Britain soon after became disgusted with the war, and the independence of the States was acknowledged.

As years rolled by it became a subject of pride among the different actors in the war, and their descendants, to boast of their efforts in the cause which had confessedly heaped so many blessings upon the country, but the names of Harvey Birch died away among the multitude of agents who were thought to have labored in secret against the rights of their countrymen. His image, however, was often present to the mind of the powerful chief, who alone knew his true character, and several times did he cause secret inquiries to be made into the other's fate, one of which only resulted in any success. By this he learned that a peddler of a different name, but similar appearance, was toiling through the new settlements that were springing up in every direction, and that he was struggling with the advance of years and apparent poverty. Death prevented further inquiries on the part of the officer, and a long period passed before he was again heard of.

CHAPTER XVII.

The Death of Harvey Birch.

It was thirty-three years after the interview which we have just related that an American army was once more arrayed against the troops of England; but the scene was transferred from the banks of the Hudson to those of the Niagara.

The body of Washington had long lain moldering in the tomb, but as time was fast obliterating the slight impressions of a political enmity or personal envy, his name was hourly receiving new luster, and his worth and integrity each moment became more visible, not only to his countrymen, but to the world. He was already the acknowledged hero of an age of reason and truth, and many a young heart, amongst those who formed the pride of our army in 1814, was glowing with the recollection of the one great name of America, and inwardly beating with the sanguine expectation of emulating in some degree its renown.

In no one were these virtuous hopes more vivid than in the bosom of a young officer who stood on the table rock, contemplating the great cataract, on the evening of the 25th of July of that bloody year. The person of this youth was tall and finely molded, indicating a just proportion between strength and activity; his deep black eyes were of a searching and dazzling brightness. At times, as they gazed upon the flood of waters that rushed tumultuously at his feet there was a stern and daring look that flashed from them, which denoted the ardor of an enthusiast. But this proud expression was softened by the lines of a mouth around which there played a suppressed archness that partook of feminine beauty. His hair shone in the setting sun like ringlets of gold as the air from the falls gently moved the rich curls from a forehead whose whiteness showed that exposure and heat alone had given their darker hue to a face glowing with health. There was another officer standing by the side of this favored youth, and both seemed by the interest they betrayed to be gazing for the first time at the wonder of the Western World. A profound silence was observed by each, until the companion of the officer that we have described suddenly started, and pointing eagerly with his sword into the abyss beneath exclaimed:

"See! Wharton, there is a man crossing in the very eddies of the cataract, and in a skiff no bigger than an eggshell."

"He has a knapsack—it is probably a soldier," returned the other. "Let us meet him at the ladder, Mason, and learn his tidings."

Some time was expended in reaching the spot where the adventurer was intercepted. Contrary to the expectations of the young soldiers, he proved to be a man far advanced in life, and evidently no follower of the camp. His years might be 70, and they were indicated more by the thin hairs of silver that lay scattered over his wrinkled brow, than by any apparent failure of his system. His frame was meager and bent, but it was the attitude of habit, for his sinews were strung with the toil of half a century. His dress was mean, and manifested the economy of its owner, by the number and nature of its repairs. On his back was a scantily furnished pack that had led to the mistake in his profession. A few words of salutation and on the part of the young men, of surprise, that one so aged should venture so near the whirlpools of the cataract, were exchanged, when the old man inquired with a voice that began to manifest the tremor of age, the news from the contending armies.

"We whipped the red coats here the other day, among the grass on the Chippewa Plains," said the one who was called Mason; "since when, we have been playing hide-and-go-seek with the ships, but we are now marching back from where we started, shaking our heads, and as surely as the devil."

"Perhaps you have a son among the soldiers," said his companion, with a milder demeanor, and an air of kindness; "if so, tell me his name and regiment, and I will take you to him."

The old man shook his head, and, passing his hand over his silver locks, with an air of meek resignation, he answered:

"No, I am alone in the world."

"You should have added, Captain Dunwoodie," cried his careless comrade, "if you could find either, for nearly half our army, has marched down the road, and may be, by this time, under the walls of Fort George, for anything that we know to the contrary."

The old man stopped suddenly, and looked earnestly from one of his companions to the other; the action being observed by the soldiers, they paused also.

"Did I hear right?" the stranger uttered, raising his hand to screen his eyes from the rays of the setting sun; "what did he call you?"

"My name is Wharton Dunwoodie," replied the youth, smiling.

The stranger motioned silently for him to remove his hat, which the youth did accordingly, and his fair hair blew aside like curls of silk, and opened the whole of his ingenuous countenance to the inspection of the other.

The reply of the stranger was interrupted by sudden and heavy explosions of artillery, which were immediately followed by continued volleys of small arms, and in a few minutes the air was filled with the tumult of a warm and well-contested battle.

The two soldiers hastened with precipitation toward the camp, accompanied by their new acquaintance.

Everything in the American camp announced an approaching struggle. At a distance of a few miles the sound of cannon and musketry was heard above the roar of the cataract. The troops were soon in motion, and a movement made to support the division of the army which was already engaged. Night had set in before the reserve and irregulars reached the foot of Lundy's Lane, a road that diverged from the river and crossed a conical eminence, at no great distance from the Niagara highway. The summit of this hill was crowned with the cannon of the British, and in the flat beneath was the remnant of Scott's gallant brigade, which for a long time had held an unequal contest with distinguished bravery. A new line was interposed, and one column of the Americans directed to charge up the hill, parallel to the road. This column took the English in flank, and, bayoneting their artillerists, gained possession of the cannon.

They were immediately joined by their comrades, and the enemy was swept from the hill. But large reinforcements were joining the English general momentarily, and their troops were too brave to rest easy under the defeat. Repeated and bloody charges were made to recover the guns, but in all they were repulsed with slaughter. During the last of these struggles the ardor of the youthful captain whom we have mentioned urged him to head his men some distance in advance, to scatter a daring party of the enemy. He succeeded, but in returning to the line missed his lieutenant from the station that he ought to have occupied. Soon after this repulse, which was the last, orders were given to the shattered troops to return to the camp. The British were nowhere to be seen, and preparations were made to take in such of the wounded as could be moved. At this moment Wharton Dunwoodie, impelled by affection for his friend, seized a lighted fusee, and taking two of his men, went himself in quest of his body where he was supposed to have fallen. Mason was found on the side of the hill, seated with great composure, but unable to walk from a fractured leg. Dunwoodie saw and flew to the side of his comrade, exclaiming:

"Ah! dear Tom, I knew I would find you the nearest man to the enemy."

"Softly, softly; handle me tenderly," replied the lieutenant; "no, there is a brave fellow still nearer than myself, and who he can be I know not. He rushed out of our smoke, near my platoon, to make a prisoner or some such thing, but, poor fellow, he never came back; there he lies just over the hillock. I have spoken to him several times, but I fancy he is past answering."

Dunwoodie went to the spot, and to his astonishment beheld the aged stranger.

"It is the old man who knew my mother!" cried the youth; "for her sake he shall have honorable burial; lift him, and let him be carried in; his bones shall rest on native soil."

The men approached to obey. He was lying on his back, with his face exposed to the glaring light of the fusee; his eyes were closed, as if in slumber; his lips, sunken with years, were slightly moved from their natural position, but it seemed more like a smile than a convulsion which had caused the change. A soldier's musket lay near him; his hands were pressed upon his breast, and one of them contained a substance that glittered like silver. Dunwoodie stooped, and, removing the limbs, perceived the place where the bullet had found a passage to his heart. The subject of his last care was a tin box, through which the fatal lead had gone; and the dying moments of the old man must have passed in drawing it from his bosom. Dunwoodie opened it, and found a paper in which, to his astonishment, he read the following:

"Circumstances of political importance, which involve the lives and fortunes of many, have hitherto kept secret what this paper now reveals. Harvey Birch has for years been a faithful and requited servant of his country. Though man does not, may God reward him for his conduct.

"GEORGE WASHINGTON."

It was the spy of the neutral ground, who died as he had lived, devoted to his country, and a martyr to her liberties.

CHATTER OF SOCIETY by POLLY PEACHTREE

TO Polly Peachtree belongs the distinction of being one of the cleverest and most entertaining society writers in this section of the country, or one might go further and say in the states. For some time past she has handled the social gossip of the Atlanta Sunday American and her stuff has been read far and broad. Her identity is kept a profound secret, and despite the fact that she is accredited with being an Atlanta woman, prominent both socially and in the world of brains, there are those who say that every bit of her column is sent North to be edited.

It has been suggested that the society editor of the Herald model a column along Polly Peachtree lines, and do the people and styles up as she does, but take it from me, she would find Augustans would not stand for it.—From the Augusta Herald.

THANKS for those kind words, though they be, like modern justice, tempered with mercilessness. And to think that critical readers deem the silly product of my flippant mind the emanations of a woman "prominent in the world of brains." And I, Polly Peachtree, have never been accused of having "brains"—I that do not even like brains (with or without eggs), nor "brainy" people, either.

Is there anyone so boresome as the woman who stands for "intellectuality" or who entertains "literary aspirations?"

And "prominent in society"—alas, the truth, by comparison, is so sad! Instead of being popular, my kind critic, I have perforce gained my information (?) through the necessity of looking on so much when partners for the turkey trot were scarce. 'Tis that which makes Polly Peachtree's column possible, for if I had my choice observation would give way to action and dancing would usurp the sober business of "taking notes."

As for my work being edited in New York, I think New York should not be made to stand for so much on so little evidence. I can truthfully say that no one in New York has ever seen Polly Peachtree's copy—either before or after printing, so far as I know. And—"Augusta people would not stand for it." And WHAT WOULD THEY DO ABOUT IT should I decide to "write them up," my friend?

Well, I have received more commendation from Atlanta people than I should have hoped for, because of my humble, though original, work along this line—original and so far unimitated, even in New York, though I have hopes of yet attaining that sincerest form of flattery, sometime, somewhere.

I do not think Atlantans, in ALLOWING Polly Peachtree to mention her modest opinions of them, will lose anything by the deed. And I think Augusta would "stand for it," too, were Augusta asked to do so gently and humbly, you know, as befits a silly, little, harebrained thing like Polly Peachtree, with an unfailing and kindly interest in all people. For, however it may sound, I can truthfully say that in all that I write there is "naught set down in malice."

THERE is a story going the rounds in Atlanta which I simply can't resist telling. I will mention no names, but the tale concerns a well-known and very popular young man of the social world. He is an Apollo in face and form, and when on the street or on the links his manly beauty simply sets the pretty heads of the girls a-swimming. But he had a secret sorrow, and when he was invited recently to a swimming party, at which the girl to whom he is particularly devoted at this particular time was to be present, he was torn with anguish.

He knows he is a handsome creature, but he knows, too, that some people might think that he does not appear well in a bathing suit. His godlikeness, then, is somewhat marred by a physical peculiarity which you will readily understand when I tell you that, in order to remedy this, and to appear with alabaster le—that is, in good form—the young man in question purchased a bottle of fuzz-remover, after trying shears and finding they wouldn't work. I understand that his object was achieved, but my informant assures me that, ungrateful wretch that he is, the young Apollo can not bear to have the subject mentioned in his presence, though the object of his admiration was duly smitten with his appearance and never suspected the efforts made to attain said appearance.

THE Chief of Police of Louisville remarked the other day that he would arrest any woman he saw in a slit skirt, provided he could spy more than eighteen inches of stocking. If this same police person had been at a certain club in Atlanta the other night, he probably would have "yanked" out some handcuffs or footcuffs, or other apparatus of that kind, to put them on a visitor in a dress cut very high to the right. Incidentally, she knew more about turkey trotting than any barnyard fowl I ever saw.

She was a regular belle, too, the chief of her admirers being a youngster of about 18, who can trot some himself. They gyrated considerably, however, and between dances a friend of the boy's mother told him he ought to be less strenuous. The same performance was repeated in the next dance, and then the matron spoke rather sharply to the youngster. "I can't help it," he said. "She won't let me stop, and I don't care who knows it!"

Unfortunately, his mother knows it to-day, and it's a side bet he has stopped.

ATLANTANS who know Hayne Ellis, now of Kansas City, will be interested in hearing that he may be commander of the President's yacht, the Mayflower. The name of Lieutenant Ellis has come up in this connection, in Washington, and I hear he has many friends in the "seats of the mighty" who are anxious for the young Georgian to get this important and honorable position.

Lieutenant Ellis used to live in Macon, and, of course, as do all prominent residents of Macon, made frequent visits to Atlanta. Since he entered upon his successful career in the navy he finds time to come to Atlanta now and then, and he always brings his charming wife, formerly Miss Sallie Long, of Kansas City.

Lieutenant Ellis has kinspeople in Atlanta and hundreds of friends who will be delighted to hear that he is in command of the beautiful yatch which has only just carried the President on a rest cruise.

IT'S early in the game for President Wilson to produce a White House bride. Even the strenuous Roosevelt required several years to show us a "royal" bride, and the Honorable Mr. Taft's prematurely ended regime left not time enough for Miss Helen.

However, Wilson had a "three-to-one better chance" than Mr. Taft, and his quick success might have been predicted.

I am glad that the bride-to-be isn't Eleanor, for that "Diary of a Girl of the White House" might be curtailed just as it began to be interesting. You have heard, I suppose, of Eleanor's diary. They say she goes around with a little book and a tiny gold pencil and jots down notes for her memoirs.

I certainly hope she will publish them before she gets as old as the usual publishers of memoirs, else some of us may be deprived of the pleasure of reading it.

This fad of keeping a diary is being revived, and 100 years from now many a "thriller" may be produced from the activities of the present-day belle, should her book escape the fate which has just overtaken the diary of Princess Patricia, daughter of the Duke of Connaught.

She had written a "perfectly dear" record of her impressions of visits to Canada and the United States, and probably other things, which we will never know now, since the strong and merciless hands of the Queen of England have closed down on the little diary of the Princess Pat.

Now, what enterprising Atlanta girl is going to perpetuate the glories of the "Era of the Turkey Trot" by writing a record of her season's pleasures? It's an opportunity for doing

News of Society

THE national holiday was suggested in the decorative details of many of the week's parties, the patriotic colors of red, white and blue being carried out in artistic detail at many pretty affairs.

At the reception given Wednesday evening by Governor and Mrs. John Marshall Slaton in honor of the General Assembly, immense flags draped over the entrance to the Executive Mansion were a noticeable feature of the elaborate decorations which prevailed on this occasion.

Besides the transformation of the entire grounds into a Japanese garden the apartments indoors were elaborately decorated, quantities of red and white gladioli from Mrs. Slaton's gardens being used.

At the breakfast party Mrs. George Dexter gave at the Piedmont Driving Club Tuesday in honor of Mrs. Slaton the national holiday was suggested in the little silk flags which were laid amid the floral decorations.

Tiny guns, tied with red, white and blue ribbons, surrounded a large basket of red and white roses, tied with blue tulle, at a tea given Wednesday afternoon by Miss Sadie Andrews in honor of her sister, Mrs. V. J. Adams, who leaves next week for permanent residence in Knoxville. The bonbons, cakes and ices were red, white and blue.

Pretty teas of last week which were brightened by Fourth of July decorations were that given by Miss Dodo White for her house party guests and that tendered Miss Ruth Matta, of Baton Rouge, Miss Mary Blalock's guest, by Miss Edith Dunson.

Miss Dunson entertained at the East Lake Country Club tea being served from a table having as a centerpiece a large vase of red and white gladioli, tied with blue tulle, the minor details being in the patriotic colors.

Pretty little shield-shaped boxes of red, white and blue satin, filled with bonbons in these colors, were given as favors at the bridge party given Thursday afternoon by Miss Jane Dorough in honor of her guest, Miss Lila Merritt, of Greensboro. The national holiday was also suggested in the decorations of red, white and blue gladioli.

An elaborate Fourth of July party was given Wednesday afternoon by Miss Bessie Small in honor of Mrs. G. R. Bethune, of Rome. The tea table had for a centerpiece a large punch bowl resting on a large flag, over which were scattered red, white and blue sweetpeas. Streamers of red, white and blue tulle were drawn from the chandelier to the corners of the table, and little red baskets were filled with red, white and blue bonbons.

The score cards were in red, white and blue, with red pencils attached, and the prizes, which were won by Miss Lucy Stockard and Miss Willie Asher, were bouquets of flowers.

Mrs. Frank Massenburg won the club prize, a piece of white and gold china. Invited to meet Mrs. Bethune were Mrs. T. C. Mell, Mrs. Frank Massenburg, Mrs. B. O. Jackson, Mrs. A. P. Davis, Mrs. G. R. Glenn, Jr., Mrs. G. A. Harbour, Mrs. Francis Arrington, Mrs. D. Y. Sage, Mrs. H. B. Rogers, Mrs. Hoyt Peck, Mrs. C. A. Camp, Misses Willie Asher, Lillian Bailey, Marion Small and Edna Blackman.

At a special Fourth of July dance given Friday evening at the East Lake Country Club the patriotic colors were observed in the decorations, and at the regular week-end dinner dance at the Piedmont Driving Club the patriotic colors were in the decorations of the ballroom and of the tables.

MISS ELEANOR MACEY and John Macey entertained at a dancing party Friday evening, July Fourth, at their home on Fourteenth Street. Flags and other red, white and blue decorations adorned the house, and vases of red and white carnations were placed on the mantles. Red boutonnieres were given the young men and white flowers were presented the girls as favors.

Miss Macey, in pink chiffon over blue satin, was assisted in receiving her guests by her mother, Mrs. David Keefer.

Among the invited guests were Misses Josephine Smith, Carrie Blount, Margaret McCarty, Helen McCullough, Lucile Kuhrt, Helen Dykes, Louise Jones, Helen Jones and her guest, Margaret Buckner, of Roanoke, Mary Carl Hurst, Ferol Humphries, Louise Collier, Louise des Verges, who is visiting Mrs. W. A. Wimbish; May Crichton, Annie Bates, Katherine Reynolds, Pattie McGehee, Allene Fielder, Jane Thrall, the guest of Mrs. A. W. Hill; Louise Broyles, Harriet Broyles, Virginia Hoffman, Virginia Lipscomb, Sophie Haas, Jane Cole, Louise Parker, Louise Cooper, Kate Cooper, Jane Cooper, Virginia Douglas, Bessie Woodard, Julia Murphy, Margaret Traylor, Adelaide Caverly, Adgate Ellis, Mamie Ansley, Gladys White, Mary Stewart, Annie Patterson and a number of young men.

A QUIET home wedding was that of Miss Carrie Alexander and P. R. Allen on Wednesday, at the home of the bride's mother, Mrs. James H. Alexander, on Juniper Street. The ceremony was performed at 9 o'clock, Dr. Dunbar Ogden officiating. The decorations throughout the house were done in palms, ferns and Ascension lilies.

Misses Eloise Alexander and Lucile Alexander were their sister's maids and little Eloise Gaines, niece of the bride, was flower girl. S. T. Sparkman, of Columbia, S. C., was best man.

The bride entered with her brother, Harry Alexander. She wore a soft white gown of chiffon and lace draped over satin and her veil was becomingly adjusted to a Juliet cap of point lace. Her jewels were a necklace and pendant of pearls, and she carried an arm bouquet of bride's roses and lilies of the valley. The bridesmaids wore white lingerie gowns and carried pink roses.

The bride's mother wore black charmeuse and lace. She was assisted in entertaining by Miss Eloise Alexander, Miss Lucile Alexander, Mrs. Lewis Gaines and Mrs. Harry Alexander. Mrs. Gaines wore lavender chiffon over satin and Mrs. Harry Alexander wore her wedding gown of ivory charmeuse and point lace.

After a month on the Great Lakes and in Canada, Mr. and Mrs. Allen will be at home at the Manor, in Asheville, N. C.

Miss Adrienne Battey

One of the many pretty girls in charming summer toilets who grace the informal parties of the season. Miss Battey was posed at Miss Helen Jones' al fresco reception for Miss Buckner, of Virginia, a recent event attended by a number of the younger girls, at the residence of Miss Jones in Inman Park. Miss Battey is one of the prettiest of Atlanta's young girls, and is noted for her exceptional cleverness and charm.

In the World of Society

THE initial social event of the week was the wedding of Miss Eloise Oliver, only daughter of Mrs. John Oliver, to Frampton Ellis, the youngest son of Judge and Mrs. William D. Ellis.

The young couple, both of whom are members of prominent families, were attended by a large wedding party, which included a charming group of bridesmaids—Misses Lula Dean Jones, Carolyn King, Susie Hallman, with Miss Mary Brown as maid of honor, and the bridegroom's sister, Mrs. William Rhett, as matron of honor.

Lieutenant Edward King was best man, and the bride, entering with her brother, John Oliver, was given away by her mother, Mrs. John Oliver.

The Oliver residence on Peachtree Street was elaborately decorated for the affair. Easter lilies forming the motif for the decorations in the hall, the drawing room and living room. Smilax made a mural decoration throughout the house, and palms were grouped in the corners of the room.

Clusters of Easter lilies, tied with the "bridal scarf," topped the newel posts of the stairway, which was entwined with smilax.

In the drawing room the chandelier was festooned with smilax, the mantel banked with small foliage plants, and tall baskets of pink gladioli. The bridal party was grouped for the ceremony before a bank of palms which entirely filled one end of the room, and reached to the ceiling.

Three tall white pedestals held great clusters of Easter lilies, tied with white "bridal scarf," and three brass seven-branch candelabra held cathedral lights.

Butterfly bowls of white tulle were caught amid the wall of greenery and the bridal party passed through an aisle of smilax and white tulle, little Misses Annie Stewart and Phoebe Ellis holding the streamers. Rev. Richard Orme Flinn, of the North Avenue Presbyterian Church, officiated.

The bride was lovely in her bridal robes of soft white charmeuse satin, combined with the same lace which had adorned her mother's wedding gown. The long court train was of satin, the corsage being veiled in the lace, which also formed angel sleeves. The tulle veil was adjusted to a little cap of point lace, wreathed in orange blossoms. The bridal bouquet was of valley lilies and bride roses.

The matron of honor wore rose pink charmeuse satin, with ovedresss of princess lace, and she carried white roses. The maid of honor wore white lace draped over white silk and her flowers were pink roses showered with valley lilies. The bridesmaids wore white net with draperies of lace and carried pink roses.

Mrs. Oliver, the bridegroom's mother, was very handsome in an imported gown of flesh-colored satin draped with hand-painted chiffon, the corsage of shadow lace having a garniture of crystal and rhinestones.

Mrs. Edward L. Bishop, the bridegroom's sister, wore white shadow lace over white silk, with pink ribbons, and Mrs. Harry Ellis, another sister, wore midnight blue chiffon. Mrs. Prioleau Ellis, of Springfield, Mass., wore orchid-colored charmeuse satin with corsage of shadow lace and tulle. Miss Annie Stewart, of Montgomery, was gowned in white lingerie.

A reception followed the ceremony, several hundred guests being entertained. The punch tables were placed on the porch, which was converted into a summer parlor, and in the living room, both bowls being imbedded in Killarney roses and valley lilies.

Misses Adgate Ellis and Virginia Lipscomb served punch. Killarney roses banked the mantel, bookcases and cabinets in the living room, and a buffet supper was served.

The bride's table resembled a miniature rose garden with its exquisite decorations of Killarney roses arranged in slender Florentine vases, caught together with crystal chains, the larger central vases being surrounded by smaller vases of the same fragrant roses.

Silver candelabra held pink tapers tipped with pink silk shades under silver filigree, and silver compotes held pink and white bonbons. Fresh pineapples, cut into baskets, tied with pink ribbons, held the first course of the wedding supper. At each plate were pink roses filled with rice, and little white satin boxes decorated with sprays of orange blossoms, containing the bride's gifts for her maids, gold bar pins inset with amethysts.

After the reception the bride and bridegroom left for Atlantic City, and on their return they will be at home for the summer with Mrs. Oliver.

WITH the approach of midsummer, Atlantans are leaving every week for the mountains or seashore, and the cottages at mountain or seashore resorts owned by Atlanta people are being opened for the summer.

"Wallahoosa," the charming new bungalow which Mr. and Mrs. Hugh Richardson have built at Toxaway, is now being occupied, Mrs. Richardson and children having left Saturday to join Mr. Richardson at the beautiful resort in the North Carolina mountains. Mr. and Mrs. James H. Nunnally are now occupying their bungalow there, and Mr. and Mrs. C. A. Wood left last week for Toxaway, on the completion of their summer cottage, which they will occupy this summer.

Mr. and Mrs. Julian Field left Tuesday for their plantation in the heart of the North Georgia mountains, near Dillard. Rabun Colony is the name of the clubhouse, about which are grouped attractive bungalows, owned by Atlanta people. Mr. and Mrs. Field have closed their home on Peachtree Street, and will spend the remainder of the summer in the mountains.

Wrightsville Beach has drawn a number of Atlanta people each week, the delightful Carolina resort being especially popular with Atlantans. Mrs. W. C. Jarnagin and Miss Erskine Jarnagin left Thursday night for Wrightsville, where they will visit Mrs. Robert Northrup at her summer cottage on the beach. Others who left Thursday for Wrightsville were Mrs. George Forrester, George and Robert Forrester, Jr., Mrs. Edward Van Winkle and young son, Edward, Mrs. Josephine Ernest Purse, Miss Margaret Northern and others.

Short motor parties are exceedingly popular at the many attractive resorts near Atlanta. Mr. and Mrs. Joseph D. Rhodes, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Stearns and Miss Ruth Wing left this week for a motor trip to Warm Springs. Mr. and Mrs. H. F. West and Miss May Scott left Saturday for an extended motor trip through the West.

AT the Executive Mansion Wednesday evening Governor and Mrs. John Marshall Slaton gave a reception in honor of the members of the General Assembly of Georgia. The affair marked the first official entertaining done under the new regime, and was a very successful affair.

The lawn around the mansion was inclosed within a tall hedge of pine, festooned with "fairy" lights.

The guests walked between rows of bay trees, garlanded with tiny electric lights, shaded in pink.

Governor and Mrs. Slaton, with the President of the Senate, J. Randolph Anderson, and Mrs. Anderson, and the Speaker of the House, William Burwell, and Mrs. Burwell, received the guests on the lawn, standing within a white pergola of lattice festooned in smilax, starred with pink-shaded lights and placed under trees through which the lights also sparkled.

Four white-latticed tea houses, hung with smilax and starred with pink-shaded lights, were charming retreats in which pretty young girls presided over punch bowls, imbedded in Killarney roses and pink and white sweetpeas. The trees on the lawn were strung with pink-shaded lights and outlined arches of greenery, the same lights appearing at the base of the fountain, banked in tinted coilas plants and shining amid the foliage of numerous bay trees.

Music was furnished throughout the evening by the band from Fort McPherson, and by the Fifth Infantry Band. An elegant supper was served during the course of the evening.

The mansion was thrown open to the guests, brilliantly lighted and decorated. In the hall were palms and vases of red and white gladioli, while smilax formed a mural decoration. The national flags and Georgia State flags added a note of color, and in the long drawing room at the left pink gladioli formed the decorations.

Mrs. Slaton's costume for the occasion was an imported model of white chiffon cloth and elaborately combined with fillet lace, which formed long pointed panels at each side. An embroidery of crystal sequins, each having as a center a rhinestone, adorned the skirt, and the draped sash of apricot satin was caught at the waist with a jeweled girdle. The short sleeves were of chiffon, and the jewels worn were a necklace of pearls and diamonds and two corsage ornaments. A summer wrap, donned later in the evening, was of apricot chiffon, embellished with jeweled embroidery and finished with a collar of marabou.

Mrs. William D. Grant, Mrs. Slaton's mother, wore white lace over white satin, and diamonds. A group of Mrs. Slaton's friends assisted in entertaining, and serving punch were Mrs. Slaton's niece, Miss Margaret Grant, and Misses Passie May Ottley, Margaret Hawkins, Harriet Calhoun, Irene Austin, Elizabeth Morgan, Marjorie Brown, Adgate Ellis and Virginia Lipscomb.

Special guests present were Colonel and Mrs. John T. VanOrsdale and General Robert K. Evans, commander of the Department of the Gulf, and Mrs. Evans.

THE wedding of Miss Henrietta Dull and Dr. James Abner Broach took place Monday evening at the home of the bride's parents, Mr. and Mrs. Samuel R. Dull. Mrs. John S. Adams, of Dublin, was matron of honor and Miss Mary Dull acted as maid of honor. Misses Louise Dull, Janet Little, Nell Ballard and Antoinette Blackburn were bridesmaids. Dr. W. B. Emery was the bridegroom's best man, and Masters Thomas Branch and Jack Branch were the ribbon bearers. Little Miss Janet Branch carried the ring in her old-fashioned bouquet.

The bride wore white charmeuse and lace; the tulled veil was held by valley lilies and the bouquet was of bride roses showered with lilies of the valley.

The maid of honor was gowned in white chiffon and carried asters; the matron wore ivory white charmeuse and shadow lace and her flowers were cream roses, while the bridesmaids wore pink crepe meteor and carried Killarney roses.

A reception followed the ceremony.

Dr. and Mrs. Broach are on a trip to Canada and the Great Lakes. Upon their return they will be at the Imperial Hotel until the completion of their home on Peachtree Heights.

MRS. JOHN MARSHALL SLATON was the honor guest at a breakfast given Tuesday morning by Mrs. George Dexter. The breakfast was given at the Piedmont Driving Club, and the national holiday was suggested in the little flags which were scattered over the table.

Vari-colored sweetpeas, arranged in a large central vase, surrounded by smaller vases of the same flowers, formed effective decorations, and on the place card of each guest were amusing "fortunes" for each guest. Rows of palms outlined the alcove of the main dining room of the club, where the table was placed, and a delicious breakfast of typical dishes were served.

Invited to meet Mrs. Slaton were Mrs. Floyd McRae, Mrs. Richard W. Johnston, Mrs. W. L. Cosgrove, Mrs. Milton Dargan, Mrs. Edward C. Peters, Mrs. Leverette Walker, Mrs. Albert Howell, Mrs. H. L. Cobbs, Mrs. Lewis Beck, Mrs. Willis Westmoreland, Mrs. Robert Cotton Alston and Mrs. Lowry Arnold.

To Have Perfect Skin Throughout the Summer

(From The Guide to Beauty.)

These days the face and neck need special care and attention. Flying dust and dirt, the beating sun, are severe on any skin. Their despoiling effects are best overcome by the application of pure mercolized wax. This keeps skin and pores in a cleanly condition, the complexion beautifully white and spotless. Tan, freckles, blotches and roughened cuticle are actually absorbed by it. One ounce of mercolized wax, obtainable at any drug store, is sufficient to completely renovate a soiled complexion. It is used like cold cream, allowed to remain on over night and washed off in the morning.

As the skin tends to expand in warm weather, causing wrinkles to form, a good astringent lotion should be used. Dissolve one ounce powdered saxolite in one-half pint of witch hazel. Bathe the face in this during the heat of the day or before going out for theater or social affair. It is a remarkable skin tightener and wrinkle eraser.

CHATTER of SOCIETY

By Polly Peachtree

JOLLY house parties of young people are being entertained at "Woodshack," "Ashantee" and other country homes of Atlantans which bear names as quaint as these homes. The custom of naming the summer home is popular, and much ingenuity is exercised in the bestowal of these names. "Woodshack," you must know, is the name of the country place owned by Mr. and Mrs. Woods White, and was given by Mrs. White, who concedes that the place is Woods' shack—though the word "shack" is hardly applicable to the large and comfortable residence where the young daughter of the house, Dodo White, is now entertaining a house party of Sophie Newcomb girls, she having recently come home from a year's stay at the New Orleans college for girls.

"Ashantee" is the name of the W. A. Parkers' summer place in Clayton County, and a merry place it is—when the jolly groups of girls and boys are gathered there as guests of Louise Parker. Almost continuously these house parties are entertained at "Ashantee," and I hear from every returning guest paeans of praise for the hospitality of "Ashantee."

I know of no form of summer entertaining which equals the house party for the young girls and boys. Of course, it is rather hard on "mother" when the house party gathers, but a well-regulated summer home is equal to the simple demands of the young girl and boy guest, these being much easier to entertain and to accommodate than older guests. I hear of many delightful house parties. Last week Marion Hodgson in Athens had a jolly group of friends for the week at her attractive home, among them being Laura Cowles and others from Atlanta. This week a group of prominent girls, who will soon be debutantes, will be guests of Susie Blackmar in Columbus. Miss Blackmar has just gotten home from "The Castle," Miss Mason's school on the Hudson, and her guests will be "Castle" girls—Misses Josephine Mobley, Glenne Dickey, of Augusta, who was a much entertained guest here last summer, you will recall, and Julia Brock, of Montgomery, also well known here through visits to her cousin, Mary Jeter.

Some time this month another house party will gather in Columbus, which city seems to be a favorite place for house parties—I suppose because of the many stately old colonial mansions that in the years "before the war" stood for Southern hospitality and which spirit is still retained by the present generation of those old families. This latter house party is to be given by Lyra Swift, and in the group of girls there will, of course, be an Atlanta representative—Mary Murphy, one of several Lucy Cobb girls of the year. Miss Swift's other guests, I hear, will be Winifred Wadley, of Macon; India Young, of Quitman, and—yes, another Atlanta girl, Pattie McGehee. A "progressive house party," composed of a group of Brenau girls, each of whom will act as hostess for a week, will be entertained during the summer by one of the members, Mary Andrews, and also will be guests of another Atlanta girl, Blanche Divine, at the family home of the Divines in Carters.

A YOUNG man who is seen frequently on the terrace of the Driving Club with a certain pretty Atlanta girl took that engaging young lady out to the ball game at Poncey when the team came back home last week.

They did not arrive until late in the game—along about the fifth inning. They seated themselves in the grandstand and he immediately became very busy trying to find out how matters stood on the diamond. She, in the meantime, was fixing her plumage, which had become rather disarranged in reaching their seats.

"What's the score?" the young cavalier asked a nearby fan.

"Nothing to nothing," replied the fan.

And then the girl, proving herself a real baseball bug, clapped her daintily gloved hands and squealed, "Oh, goody, we haven't missed a thing."

And she wondered why they laughed.

IT happened at Brookhaven, and it might be termed "The Adventure of the Madcap Wind and Three Fair Bathers."

It also gave the more than 200 spectators on the veranda a fair example of the old saying that "when wind and woman join in revel, woman fares but sadly." It all happened last Sunday afternoon, and most of you have probably heard about it already.

There were three of them, three lovely girls, all members of the smart set of Atlanta. They motored out to Brookhaven—I beg pardon—the Capital City Country Club—and decided to take a plunge in the lake. Now, as you all know, the ladies' bathhouse at Brookhaven is a tentlike affair built on a platform. Into this dressing room went our three heroines, resplendent in lawns and laces and youth and beauty, to emerge a few minutes later, clad in bathing suits and more youth and beauty. One was tall and dark, and one was short and fair, while one was purely plump.

Once in the water, they splashed and gurgled with glee, all unmindful of the dark, threatening thunderheads that were approaching so swiftly. A sudden dazzling streak of lightning and a deafening peal of thunder sent the three maidens scurrying in fright for the tent. Once in, they seemed safe from the windstorm which broke in fury over the grounds.

About five minutes elapsed, then all at once those on the veranda beheld the tent suddenly torn from its moorings, amid shrieks of horror from our three heroines. There they stood, locked in a frenzied embrace, for all the world like a cluster of September Morns.

There were a few moments of tenseness, of which there is no distinct record, and then—oh, how grateful are the three maidens to the friendly bearers of linen dusters and other life-saving garments! A deluge of rain—a few short moments previous a thing to be deplored—came now as a welcome intruder, for it drove the spectators indoors, and served as a protecting curtain for the escape of the three mermaids.

A LADY of my acquaintance gave a luncheon recently and intended to serve her guests with ham, for which she is famous. She explained that she always cooked ham by the recipe used by Thomas Jefferson, which had been handed down in her family for years.

This recipe required that the ham be cooked for about two hours by simmering, but under no condition must it be allowed to boil.

A ham was on the stove, its destinies presided over by a young colored woman from up in the mountains.

"Jane," called the mistress of the house, "don't let that ham boil."

"No'um," replied Jane. "I ain't er gwine to boil no ham. It's on the stove now just a simpering!"

The first contains two growing plants;
The second holds her pickles;
The third, her letters; fourth, perchance,
Odd pencils, dimes and nickels;
The fifth, potatoes yet unpeeled;
The sixth contains some chowder;
Within the seventh lie, concealed,
Some cold cream and some powder.
"Why, what receptacles are these,"
You ask, "with use so varied?"
Just cut glass dishes, if you please,
For she was lately married.

"YES, I heard she got 1,400 pickle dishes and over 2,000 berry spoons." I turned in amazement to the speaker whose astonishing remark I overheard, as we both stood near the door of the library in which the tables of wedding presents were on display.

Surely, thought I, the girl didn't have such a misfortune as this to fall upon her—so sweet and pretty a bride as she was, too! But no! The speaker went on: "Yes, a friend of mine, who was in Berlin, said the wedding was certainly a grand affair!" And I turned away, relieved.

Of course, the Atlanta brides get duplicate presents at times, but I have really wondered how the thing is avoided so often, in a city of this size, too, where the shops are not many.

I understand that many of the "appropriate" and "matching" wedding presents of silver and cut glass are chosen with discriminating knowledge of what everybody is going to give, by one or two of the leading shops of the city, the clerks being given full liberty (with a check limit, of course) in the selection of most of the presents. These may not be much sentiment in choosing a present this way, but the result is more satisfactory—you know. Sentiment has a very "wabbly" judgment, at best.

SPEAKING of sentiment in the bestowal of bridal gifts, I happened to note at the Oliver-Ellis wedding the other night a really sentimental gift—this being a quaint little old-fashioned case of red plush, containing six heavily engraved teaspoons and on an accompanying card the names of four bridal couples in the family of the bridegroom, reaching back to as many generations, upon whose wedding gift table this little red case of teaspoons had been placed.

And this re-giving was not the result of dissatisfaction with the spoons on the part of the recipients, but just a bit of odd sentiment, which has waxed with repetition, and has now grown so strong that the spoons are sure to go down the ages as heirlooms to the brides of the family.

Of course, if the heirloom were a string of pearls they might be more valued by each of the brides, but a string of pearls would wrench the heart of each owner at parting, so I suppose for practical purposes as a continual wedding gift silver teaspoons in a red plush case constitute the wiser selection.

IF there is any real aristocracy of birth in the United States, the "F. F. V.'s," with their pedigrees going back in an unbroken line to Cavalier ancestors, have the best claim to this distinction. For a long, long time the famous resorts of Virginia and West Virginia have been the gathering places for Southern aristocracy in the summer time.

The Greenbriar White, the White Sulphur Springs and Old Point Comfort are redolent of old-time aristocracy. Since the days when Madame Bonaparte, the American wife of the famous Napoleon's gay young brother, reigned as a belle at the Greenbriar White and for many years after her discredited marriage as the autocrat of the chaperon circle, this Virginia resort has been the summer playground of the most exclusive Southern society.

Atlantans who go to the famous Virginia resorts are Mr. and Mrs. Thomas B. Paine, Mr. and Mrs. William Lawson Peel and Mr. and Mrs. John Grant. The Grants will spend the month of August at the Greenbriar White, and there Miss Margaret Grant, the debutante of next season, will have a foretaste of the social pleasures to come.

Mr. Paine leads all the big dances at the Greenbriar White, and both he and his wife are constant and graceful dancers. They tell me that even so early in the season the new steps have been introduced at this historic old resort. At the first dance of the season in the Colonial ballroom of the White Sulphur Springs Hotel last week the "White Sulphur Riley," long famous as the favorite dance there, was superseded by the tango and the turkey trot.

A few still clung to the waltz and the two-step, but found themselves more conspicuous, 'tis said, than were the trotters.

Mr. and Mrs. Leigh C. Palmer, of Washington, are to spend a part of the summer at the Greenbriar White. I have heard, Mrs. Palmer is a former Atlantan, her husband being aide to the Secretary of the Navy.

The Pilsons of Washington, known in Atlanta, are at the Greenbriar White, and the Elkins, including Miss Katherine, usually go there every summer for a stay. Mrs. Billups Phinizy, of Athens, and Miss Nellie Phinizy, after a visit here, have gone on to Virginia, and I predict that pretty Miss Nellie will be a great belle at the Greenbriar White this year.

ATLANTA women who drive their own cars and like to "hit 'er up" would do well to imitate the clever idea of Mrs. Reginald Vanderbilt. Mrs. Vanderbilt drives her own car, and drives it mighty well. Mrs. Vanderbilt doesn't like to drive slowly. The laws governing the Long Island roads near her Newport estate are very strict. However, they exempt a sheriff or a deputy sheriff from their provisions. When Mrs. Vanderbilt first applied for a deputy sheriff's position, her friends wondered what it was all about, but her idea was so good that she could not keep it to herself.

And now the entire Newport colony knows that Mrs. Vanderbilt's sole idea was to render herself immune from all speed laws.

She failed of her purpose, but we must all admit that her idea was certainly clever.

THERE is no use denying that we of the South have an intimate personal interest in the present administration and in our foreign representatives. It seems like members of our family have come into their own. For instance there are the Walter Pages over in London—we smile over their tribulations in house hunting, rejoice in the expressions of approval accorded them by the English, and laugh outright, with a sort of brotherly admiration and sympathy for young Page, who had no special words of awe to speak after he had attended his first official reception in satin knee breeches, remarking instead that he "felt just like he was 'fixed up' for a baseball game!"

That long-looked for home, I see by the papers has been found, and I understand that No. 5 Grosvenor Square, has "a little garden in the rear," where, I'll venture to say, Mrs. Page will plant some phlox and nasturtiums this summer. The house is described as being very imposing in front, however, with Ionic columns, etc., so that of course the dignity of the American nation can be kept up there by some of the family while the others dig in the garden.

I am glad that the place was found in time for the Fourth of July celebration which Mr. Page threatened to give somewhere anyway, in order to celebrate the "birthday of Roosevelt," according to some of the English papers. By the time that Mr. and Mrs. Pleasant Stovall get fixed up in Berne, Switzerland, and other friends have found ambassadorial residences or ministerial homes—our trips abroad can be broken by little visits here and there—that is, if all these foreign honors and decorations do not obliterate the memory of the folks at home.

Gone the day when oratory
Opened up its little bag
Full of tricks and hunkydoodle,
On the subject of the rag.

Now we "one-step" to the music
When the band begins to play,
And we listen to no "speeches"
On the subject of the flag.

I'LL concede that Atlanta is not altogether a "typical Southern city," for the Fourth of July this year was made hideous with the popping of giant firecrackers. This could not happen in a typical Southern city, and let us pray, will not spread to more fortunate towns where, as of old, the Fourth is only observed in the decorations for a social event, and mayhap, in the quiet reading over of the Declaration of Independence by a specially fervid patriot.

I hope it will not seem that we are lacking in patriotism, who object to jeopardizing the life and limbs of Young America with gunpowder as an expression of the love we have for our country, even as the children of larger growth are sometimes sacrificed in the name of patriotism.

I like the way the Daughters of the American Revolution celebrated the Fourth, with dancing and social pleasures at the new Hotel Ansley this year the brilliant "Tango Evening" of the Habersham Chapter being given "for the benefit" of the new chapter house, wherein patriotism will be fostered more surely than by the popping of firecrackers.

And the celebration at Atlantic Beach suits me also. Every year the Fourth of July ball there is a more happy occasion than the year before, the water carnival is more brilliant. The gorgeous Fourth of July celebration at Atlantic Beach has become famous, and I hear that two pretty Atlanta girls, Marion Goldsmith and Ruth Stallings, were the belles of the ball there last week.

In the REALM of SOCIETY

SEVERAL affairs of the past week attended by members of the younger set were complimentary to girls who will be debutantes next year. So many popular young women of prominent families will be introduced, predictions of a very gay season are being made.

Miss Margaret Grant, the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John Grant, who leave soon to spend the summer at the Greenbriar White, was the honor guest at a charming little tea Thursday at the Driving Club, given by Mrs. Hugh Richardson.

The group of girls included several of the coming season's "buds" and a few of the present year debutante set, among those in attendance on the tea being Misses Grant, Margaret Hawkins, Adgate Ellis, Jennie D. Harris, Eula Jackson, Mamie Ansley, Harriet Calhoun and Marjorie Brown. Mr. and Mrs. John Grant and Mr. and Mrs. Edward Inman were members of the party.

Miss Mary Brown, the lovely young daughter of Mr. and Mrs. George M Brown, made her debut as a bridesmaid last week, acting as maid of honor to Miss Eloise Oliver upon her marriage to Frampton Ellis Monday evening. Miss Brown's cousin, Miss Cora McCord Brown, also a next year debutante, acted as bridesmaid at a brilliant Augusta wedding recently and has been much entertained since, having remained in Augusta for a week or so.

Miss Dorothy Harman, who is back from Berlin, where she has been at school, was the guest of honor at a small tea Wednesday at the Driving Club, given by her mother, Mrs. Harry Harman. Twelve girls were present, the tea being the first of a series which Mrs. Harman has planned to give for her younger daughter this summer.

Miss Adgate Ellis was one of the debutantes "serving punch" at the reception given by Governor and Mrs. John Marshall Slaton, a brilliant affair of Wednesday evening, and Miss Margaret Grant, a niece of Mrs. Slaton, was another member of the group of young women who thus assisted the Governor's wife in her hospitality to the members of the Georgia Legislature.

Most of the girls who are to be debutantes will leave soon for various resorts, returning early in the autumn in order to be ready for the winter's activities. The plans of Mrs. Henry Jackson for her daughter, Eula, to spend the summer in Europe have been changed, and they will leave soon for the East Coast.

AMONG the happy events of last week were several informal parties given by young boys who are popular members of the younger set. Both girls and boys were guests of these informal affairs, the young people being chaperoned by the parents of the young hosts.

One of the happiest of these events was the dancing party given Wednesday evening by Howard McCall, Jr. The affair was given at the summer home of his grandfather, R. W. Tidwell, on the Williams Mill Road, where Mr. and Mrs. McCall are spending the summer. Dancing was followed by supper, the host of the evening being assisted in entertaining by his parents.

Another dancing party was given Friday evening by Jack Macy at the home of his mother, Mrs. David Keefer. A number of young people were entertained, and assisting in entertaining was Miss Eleanor Macy, the lovely young sister of the host.

On Tuesday evening Robert Crichton will give a dancing party for young people at the home of his parents, Mr. and Mrs. E. C. Crichton, in honor of Misses Lila Ward Hamilton and Elizabeth Hamilton, of Rome, who are guests of his mother, when 50 young people will be entertained.

THE formal bridge party given Wednesday afternoon by Miss Beatrice Tyler was one of a series of parties being tendered Miss Laurette Lewis, a bride-elect of July. Miss Elizabeth Dozier won the prize, a Japanese flower basket.

A "stocking shower" for the bride-elect was a feature of the afternoon. Garden flowers formed the decorations, and the guests included Misses Dean Tyler, Laurette Lewis, Elizabeth Dozier, Mrs. Samuel Green, Mrs. E. H. Glenn, Mrs. L. W. Johnson, Mrs. George Shepard, Mrs. W. N. Bennett, Mrs. Jere Taylor.

THE informal bridge party given Wednesday by Mrs. Frank Atlee was one of a series being tendered Miss Bertha Vaughn, a bride-elect.

A Charming Bride and Her Maids

The former Miss Eloise Oliver, in center, whose marriage to Frampton Ellis was the most important wedding of the week in Atlanta society. The group of friends in attendance on the bride, from left to right, are Miss Lula Dean Jones, Mrs. William H. Rhett, matron of honor; Miss Mary Brown, maid of honor; Miss Margaret Hallman and Miss Caroline King. The marriage was a brilliant event of Monday evening, at the home of the bride's mother, Mrs. John Oliver, the ceremony being followed by a large reception, attended by many friends of the popular young couple. Mr. Ellis, the bridegroom, is a son of Judge and Mrs. W. D. Ellis.

CHATTER of SOCIETY

by POLLY PEACHTREE

something fine, girls. Just think of leaving as a legacy to future generations the "Diary of an Atlanta Belle."

Of course, the interest and value of the book will depend on how much you tell. Don't be sparing of self analysis, and be sure to tell all about your love affairs—that is an important part of any book, you know.

There are dangers and responsibilities in this diary keeping, chief of which is the fact that the diary may not be kept long.

Someone might get it before the hundred years elapses, and the mellowing influences of time have rendered innocuous the possible confessions of the writer. Then it will be burned, probably by the Queen Mary of the family.

A tintinabulation sweet,
A twinkling of two little feet,
And from the sheath my lady wears
A golden anklet-ring appears.

It is not made of filigree,
As any one who runs may see,
But just a fetching fashion-fad.
To make a happy girl-heart glad.

I SUPPOSE there is a case of chagrin coming to Atlanta when I tell you that a Macon girl has been more up to date than our girls, in that she has introduced the latest fad, an ornamental anklet, worn with the prevailing slit skirt of the season. Of course, Macon is "conservative" to a certain extent, though many more maids and matrons of that city are chic and up to date than you would suppose to hear some of the "old fogies" talk.

And charming Ruth Smith, a daughter of one of the oldest and most exclusive Southern families, granddaughter of the late Mrs. Villapique, of Atlanta, who was a famous before-the-war society beauty, is the modish young woman who introduced the jeweled anklet on Macon's beautiful College Street promenade.

Miss Smith, with her mother, makes an annual visit abroad, and is very smart and chic; so her new ornament created little surprise, though much admiration, mixed with some consternation on the part of the aforesaid "conservative" element.

It is said that Ruth Smith's anklet much resembled the old-fashioned bracelet, being of gold and handsomely carved, with small jewels inset. Gleaming through the slit of the chiffon and satin skirt, or the smart white ratine of the walking suit, the effect is altogether lovely.

WHAT would you do if in strolling on upper Peachtree you should suddenly come face to face with a beautiful goddess in a Greek costume, her bare feet shod with sandals of white leather and damascened gold, and buckled at the ankles with gold clasps, and this vision reclining in a magnificent litter borne on the shoulders of four servants?

This is the sight that greeted the patrons of one of the principal theaters of Paris last week, and the costume was worn, not as you might think by a clothing model, but by a woman of title.

According to the dispatches, her costume, a green tunic, was apparently her sole garment, and was embroidered with green stones, and draped so as to follow the slightest undulations of her figure.

She arrived at the theater in a beautiful litter, which carried her into the foyer, and she left in the same manner.

In talking with a Russian grand duke during the entr'acte, the baroness was overheard to say that she only wished that all pretty women would follow the example which she was proud to be the first to give. In the daytime, she said, she would appear in classical clothing, of which she already had had more than twenty models made.

"That dear Paris" makes our fashions, but I venture to wager that this style will never become popular in Atlanta, although I will admit that it certainly sounds comfortable on these hot days.

AND, by the way, all of this stir-up and talk of the fads and follies of the modern woman reminds me that the women of other days were not above the little vanities and fads that our present-day girls affect. A woman who remembers assures me that the belle of the seventies, to her certain knowledge, wore tiny silver bells on her silken garters, tinkling sounds following her as she danced the stately steps of the day. Goodness me, what sounds would be aroused by the Texas Tommy, I wonder, should this fad be revived. The cane-carrying custom, this same lady assures me, is not a modern invention, but just a revival of the older custom, when the girls carried long, slender canes, almost as tall as themselves—but canes just the same. I have seen several of our girls carrying canes the past week. I predicted last week that Callie Hoke Smith and her swagger stick would find imitators.

There's a dance that is succeeding
Turkey Trot!
Perchance you may have danced it!
Guinea Squat,
Is the name the faddists name it,
Nor lives the man to claim it!
If it's ragged, you cannot tame it!
(Gee, but this is rot.)
As for Guinea Squat, you dance it,
With a glide and then you prance it,

To the left you step and lightly
Twirl upon your toes! Then brightly
Smile. Be not too gay or sprightly.

Balance on your right foot boldly,
Turning from your partner coldly
Back and squat!
Rise and squat.

Whether you would rise or not,
For the exercise is better,
For the fat, than Turkey Trot.

I AM told upon good authority that the ladies burdened with too much avoirdupois have discontinued their flesh-reducing exercises. And no wonder. It's just too hot to go through the "one, two, three, four" contortions, and the rolling and other evolutions that are so promising to read about and so hard to perform.

I do not blame the women. But it is just as difficult to get fat as it is to get thin, and the only exercise that supplies both demands is turkey trotting or guinea squatting, which I hear is the foundation of the whole system of work for making the human figure divine.

Turkey trotting is, after all, but a modification of "Old Witch, Old Witch, What Time, Old Witch?" that has been danced on the green for hundreds of years, and as for guinea squat, I'll wager a vanity box that there is scarcely a person young enough in the city who has not played "guinea squat" in youthful years. And the new dance, guinea squat, is but a rhythmical reproduction of that very game, so dear to childish vitality, and so important to milady, who desires a lightness of limb, and laughter.

CONSIDERABLE excitement, and maybe just a bit of trepidation, was caused this past week at the new Brookhaven country home of the Capital City Club, I am told, when the name of Newport A. Lanford, more or less prominently connected with the present civic uplift movement and a prolific contributor to the literature now most in favor in the city, was found on the guest book.

"There have been tango teas, you know," and sotto voce conversation of a similar nature were heard from the groups that clustered around the register. That Mr. Lanford's card was issued at the request of Thomas B. Felder created no comment.

There was more conversation when a few hours later the name of "Charlie Jones" was inscribed with the indorsement of "Marion Jackson."

Investigation followed and quiet once more reigned when it was discovered that a gentleman who is noted for his devotions at the nineteenth hole of the golf course was suggesting, "Let's register Harry Grizzard's name and sign it Joe Brown Connally."

THE waning popularity of Newport will doubtless be revived now that the foreign embassies are renting "cottages" there for the summer. The German, Russian and Spanish Embassies will be located at Newport, which is now being called the diplomatic summer capital.

The Count and Countess von Bernstorff, of Germany, will spend July at Newport, later going abroad. Ambassador and Madame George Bakhmeteff, of the Russian Embassy, have a place for the entire summer, this being their second year at Newport.

The Spanish Embassy is located at the playground of the Four Hundred for the first time, Ambassador Senor Don Juan Riano y Gayanos and his wife being popular and well known to many of the "cottagers," which is the chief reason for their going to Newport.

It is not generally known, at least by the people of my generation, unless they are better informed than I was, that Newport was once the chosen summer resort of the most prominent Southern society. I was told recently, "on good authority," that Newport was first settled by the Southerners, who, in years agone, went there in numbers.

When the millionaire element of the East came in, however, the modest fortunes of aristocratic Southerners forced most of them to give up Newport. In the past ten years or so, a number of Southern beauties have been included in Newport's resident set, and among the visitors.

Summer before last, most of you remember, Loulie Roper, of Atlanta, cousin of Mrs. Burton Smith and niece of Mrs. John B. Gordon, was toasted at Newport as the most beautiful girl there. She was the guest of Marguerite Shonts, and was entertained at all the wonderful Newport affairs of the Four Hundred.

Mrs. Cornelius Vanderbilt, Jr., is a Southerner, and she introduced her cousin, Martha Johnston, of Macon, now Mrs. DeLancey Kountze, of New York, to Newport society. Miss Johnston immediately became a great favorite, partly on account of her gracious Southern ways and partly because of her typical Southern beauty, of dark eyes and hair, and a glowing pink and white complexion.

The Baroness Rosenkrantz, a former Atlanta girl, and Mrs. Rittenhouse Moore, of Montgomery, are Southerners who have been received in the exclusive Newport colony in recent years.

Mrs. James B. Duke, who has made such a great social success abroad with the highest social circles of London, has not yet visited Newport.

It is sometimes easier to enter Newport by way of London and Paris than New York, 'tis said.

I HEARD that Rosalie Davis, a next season's debutante of Atlanta, was to ride in the International Horse Show, held in London last week. If she did, Miss Davis was at a disadvantage because of the orders issued by the King that none of the women ride astride.

She is one of the best of the younger riders in Atlanta, and, like most of the girls who ride, has never used any but the cross saddle. I do not recall that any Atlanta woman among the good riders of the city use the old-fashioned side-saddle; excepting only Miss May Atkinson, who has been notable for her adherence to the old way of riding. It seems queer that the Englishwomen, who of all women are fondest of horseback riding, should be condemned to the silly method of sitting sidewise as she rides, with her entangling skirts hanging over the side and threatening to pull her down at every step. The new habits, it is true, make concessions to safety, in a degree, but, of course, can not approach the comfort and convenience of the regulation habit now almost universally worn in the United States, where practically all the women ride astride.

There was general condemnation among the Englishmen of the riding astride, and Miss Ruth Boyd, of New York, it appears, was about the only woman brave enough to advocate the cross saddle in the face of the strong disapproval of the King (speaking for the old-fashioned Queen, of course).

Rosalie Davis, who was to have ridden, but may have failed to do so, on account of this restriction, is one of the most athletic girls in Atlanta. She rides well, dances well, plays tennis and golf exceedingly well.

Another athletic debutante of next season is Mary Allgood Jones, who is also abroad and expected to see the London Horse Show. Miss Jones is an advocate of the cross saddle, and has ridden in many Southern Horse Shows. Other Atlanta girls who use the cross saddle exclusively are Misses Helen Jones, Eleanor Raoul, Margaret McKee, Josephine Mobley, Aurelia Speer and Josephine Windle.

AN apt French idiom "dejeuner de soleil" is applied to a gown which fades easily in the sun.

But I can think of no more fit phrase to apply to some gowns that we see every day, or for that matter every night, on Atlanta streets. A strong arc light acts in the same manner as the sun to nullify the protection of the flimsy dresses our girls are now wearing.

Some one of these days I am going to lose my temper and give one of these flagrant disregarders of the proprieties a good shaking and a good piece of my mind.

A well-known woman has said that "the petticoat is the badge of dignity." It must be that this accounts for the increased frivolity among my sex.

Cox College Girls Picnic at Grant Park

Cox College provides frequent pleasure excursions for the students which prove helpful along educational lines as well as affording a pleasing diversion from the heavy mental strain of the college course.

Miss Corinne Stanton, who won the cup this summer in the Georgia State Tennis Tournament and has won a cup and three gold medals in California, will be connected the coming year with the Athletic Department.

For the coming year Cox College is offering many and most unusual advantages along all lines of college and conservatory work. The faculty is very able and superior, the courses of study interesting and practical, the equipment adequate and the home life is most pleasant.

A free scholarship in the literary department has been offered in each congressional district in the State. Anyone interested in this scholarship should apply at once to Cox College and Conservatory, College Park, Ga.

Miss Brown will enter Vassar College in the fall.

A motor tour of several weeks through Maine and Massachusetts, with a short stay at Vassar College, completed the trip.

Mrs. J. M. High and family have taken possession of their new home on Peachtree Street, near Fifteenth Street.

THE young college set is enjoying many house parties this month.

Miss Dodo White, who attended Sophie Newcombe School in New Orleans last winter, has several of her college mates with her at the country home of her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Woods White, at "Woodshack."

The party includes Misses Helen Dunn, of Lake Providence, La.; Elizabeth Stubbs, of Shreveport; Cleta Slagle, of Clarkes, La., and Alice Jones, of Birmingham.

Delightful social events have contributed to the pleasure of the visitors, among them being the Five o'Clock tea given Thursday afternoon by Miss White at her town residence. It seemed a pity that she couldn't have all her friends with her at the cool country home, but she was sensible enough to know that it was more convenient to have the party in town, so in she came and set to work decorating the porches and interior of the house with flags and red and white carnations, making believe it was already the Fourth.

Assisting her in entertaining the guests were Misses Marion Neal, Harriet Haynes, Marion Woolley, Laura Sawtell, Madge Pollock, Frances Ansley, Marie Cobb, Margaret Moore, Frances Bailey of Jacksonville, Margaret Fraser, Dorothy Traynham, Louise Dodd and Emma Laurie Freeman.

At 7 o'clock 20 or 25 young men joined the party and they had an informal buffet supper.

Miss Edith Dunson gave a tea at the East Lake Country Club Thursday afternoon for Miss Ruth Matta, of Baton Rouge, the guest of Miss Mary Blalock.

Tea was served at a long table which had as its centerpiece a tall vase filled with crimson gladioli, and favors of shield-shaped boxes of bonbons in red, white and blue, marked the guests' places. Miss Dunson wore a white lingerie gown and a hat of white lace trimmed in bows of tulle.

MISS Jane Dorough and Miss Louise Dorough gave a Fourth of July party Thursday at their home on North Jackson Street. The party was in honor of Miss Lila Merritt, of Greensboro, and for Miss Artie Shealley, of Oglethorpe, and Miss Celeste Webber, of Spartanburg. Bridge was played, and the tables were placed on the cool, shaded lawn, where red, white and blue flags formed the decorative scheme. Tall hollyhocks and ferns formed a hedge about the inviting lawn. The prizes were gold belt pins, for top score and also for consolation. Miss Jane Dorough wore a white crepe gown with shadow lace. Miss Louise Dorough was gowned in white embroidered voile and sash of pink satin, while Miss Merritt was lovely in a pale blue marquisette. Twenty-four girls, all members of Miss Jane Dorough's bridge club, were guests at the party.

MRS. Karl Brittain's home on North Avenue was the scene of an afternoon reception Thursday when the Brenau Club entertained in honor of the students at Brenau who are home for the summer.

Black and gold are the school colors, and in every detail possible these colors were carried out. The tea table in the dining room had a centerpiece of black-eyed Susans, and the mints and ices were yellow.

College pennants adorned the punch table, where gorgeous nasturtiums were banked about the base of the bowl. Smilax and ropes of black and yellow tulle decorated the chandeliers, and quantities of daisies in large jardinieres were placed about the house.

Assisting Mrs. Brittain in entertaining the guests were the officers of the club, who are Mrs. V. J. Adams, president; Mrs. William Owens, vice president; Miss Mary Lucy Turner, treasurer, and Mrs. Rogers Winter, secretary.

After the ceremony there will be a reception to which 150 invitations have been issued. As Mr. Harvey will take his bride to Baltimore to live, all the parties in compliment to Miss Trammell will precede the wedding. Among them will be the party that Mrs. Dan Lyle will give; Mrs. Charles Wickersham and Mrs. Eugene Grey will also entertain, and there will be several affairs given by Miss Trammell's girl friends.

MISS MARY PEABODY, Miss Nellie Walker and Miss Evelyn Greene entertained at a swimming party at the home of Miss Greene's uncle and aunt, Mr. and Mrs. Forrest Adair, Tuesday evening.

After an hour or more of swimming in the picturesque pool the young people changed their bathing suits for dancing togs and went to the lovely home of Mr. and Mrs. W. J. Peabody, where a delicious buffet supper was served, and the party, as all parties do these days and evenings, enjoyed the Turkey Trot.

The chaperones of the informal affair were Mr. and Mrs. Forrest Adair, Mr. and Mrs. Will D. Greene, Mr. and Mrs. W. J. Peabody, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Gregg, Mr. and Mrs. Forrest Adair, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Leon Walker, and Mr. and Mrs. Obid A. Lombard.

ONE of the most beautiful events in the social history of South Georgia was the wedding of Miss Minnie Evelyn Warren and Joseph Lamar Grady, which was solemnized Wednesday evening in the Methodist Church at Brinson.

The church was decorated in ferns, palms and Southern smilax. The space reserved for the wedding party was marked off with white pedestals crowned with ostrich plume ferns.

Prior to the ceremony Miss Ruth Grady, of McRae, sang and E. H. McNeil, of Macon, played the wedding march. The officiating minister was Rev. E. M. Overby, pastor of the Methodist Church at Sylvester.

The ribbon bearers, Misses Willet Summit, Georgia Lee Grady and Emma Hargrove, entered first.

The ushers were Billie B. Bush, of Colquitt and M. L. Glenn, of Quincy.

The groomsmen were J. Lamar Grady, Will McIntosh and Joe McDuffie, of Bainbridge.

The bridesmaids, Misses Amelia Morton, of Lumpkin; Louise Balcom, of eGorgetown, and Mabel Hill, of Waycross, wore gowns of white and yellow crepe meteor and carried bouquets of sunburst roses.

Mrs. Billie B. Bush, of Colquitt, was matron of honor, wearing her wedding dress.

Master Olin Hodges carried the ring, and the litle flower girls, Lucile Miller and Lilly Myrtle Tomlin, in dainty white lingerie frocks, carried yellow crepe paper baskets filled with white sweetpeas.

The bride entered with her maid of honor, Miss Ruth Jones, who wore a white crepe meteor and princess lace and carried Marechal Niel roses.

The bride's gown was of duchess satin with a garniture of seed pearls and princess lace. The tulle veil was caught to the hair with a spray of orange blossoms and fell in graceful folds to the edge of the long-pointed train. She carried bride's roses showered with lilies of the valley.

A reception followed, the couple leaving later for Atlantic City.

The National colors, red, white and blue, were used at the informal little tea given by Miss Sadie Andrews Wednesday afternoon for her sister, Mrs. W. J. Adams, who will leave Tuesday to make her home in Knoxville, Tenn.

Red and white roses effectively arranged in a large basket, the handle of which was tied with blue tulle bows, graced the tea table where paper guns, painted red, white and blue, contained bonbons. These little souvenirs were given to the guests as favors.

Assisting Miss Andrews in the entertainment of the guests was her mother, Mrs. John H. Andrews.

Punch was served on the porch by Misses Mary Andrews, Annie Winship Bates and Sarah Eubanks.

Miss Andrews was becomingly gowned in pink crepe with shadow lace draped in tunic effect on the skirt, this same lace forming the corsage.

SOCIETY CHATTER BY POLLY PEACHTREE

FOR an inland city, Atlanta has many expert swimmers among the women and girls. Of course, all men will learn to swim, even if they have to practice in the "old swimmin' hole," but for women swimming is—like tomatoes and olives—a cultivated taste.

This year the social set seems to be doing more swimming than ever before—in fact, I hear of nothing but swimming parties and dances. The many beautiful private pools and inland lakes on the suburban and country estates of Atlantans, supplementing the lakes at the Capital City Country Club and the East Lake Club, furnish plenty of water for those who like to hwim or splash.

The hospitality of Forrest Adair in giving his friends a standing invitation to visit his beautiful pool at any time has resulted in many happy hours for the fortunate people who can claim this privilege on the strength of friendship to the owner.

I hear that a number of expert divers and swimmers have developed since the professional swimmer here on a vaudeville engagement a few weeks ago was engaged by Mr. Adair to give exhibitions of her skill to companies of ladies at the Adair swimming pool. The lady aforesaid making a business of swimming insisted on her "pupils" wearing bathing suits like the men, and she tried to get them to kick off stockings and slippers. But the ladies rebelled at that and took their "pointers" from "Ideal" with their silk hose on, even though they had to doff their skirts.

"Why, I can't do that," remonstrated one of the fine swimmers, whom the instructor selected as best adapted to display her dives and fancy stunts, hoseless and skirtless, "I am married." "Well, so am I," was the reply; but of course there are husbands and husbands, which the lady knew, and so acted upon her knowledge.

But the amateur swimmers learned much from this professional exhibit, and the fair divers have had fine times since then at the Adair pool on these morning dips, when there is not a man nearer than the hot city to their "fringed grotto."

Mrs. J. Frank Meador is a fine swimmer and a fancy diver. She is at Wrightsville Beach at present, and is much at home in the surf as in still waters. Mrs. Rix Stafford is a good swimmer, speedy and graceful, and dives well. Mrs. W. C. Jarnigan swims well, and Mrs. Lee Lowman is a good swimmer.

Among the best swimmers at the East Lake Club on these summer afternoons are Miss Helen Thorn, Miss Lyda Nash, Miss Dorothy Arkwright and Miss Alexa Stirling. At the Capital City Country Club Miss Mabel Drake does fancy things in the water, and Misses Laura Ansley, Mignon McCarty, Jennie D. Harris and Helen Dargan swim beautifully. Miss Dargan dives with fearlessness.

THE Capital City Club held the first dance of a summer series last week, and a happy affair it was. There is a tendency to "dress up" among the members of the younger contingent going to the new country club, I notice, despite the published hint, inspired by some of the official members, that "informal costuming" would prevail. The men, I see, adhere to this custom by wearing the white trousers and blue coat, or the all white serge suit, such as they would wear at the seashore evening dances.

The president of the club, Robert F. Maddox, who is always the "glass of fashion and the mold of form," set a high standard of perfection in dressing for the men at the Country Club reception week before last. He wore a white serge two-piece suit with a tiny blue stripe in it, the blue being emphasized in the single corn flower thrust through the lapel buttonhole of his coat, white shoes, white silk plaited shirt and white silk hose.

The charm of the new country club, however, is the privilege of informality, which suits most of us so well during this hot weather period. I note that at all of the "afternoon tea parties" at the clubs and at the homes of the younger set who usually give them at this season of the year there are men a-plenty.

This is most unusual, for men have always "fought shy" of afternoon parties, being sometimes hard enough to get in sufficient numbers for evening affairs ("if this be treason, then make the most of it"). Now the men flock to the evening affairs and are noted in considerable numbers at the parties of the late afternoon. And the reason why is not hard to find—turkey trotting now goes with every cup of tea dispensed. Once upon a time, before the one step was invented, I asked a man why he didn't like afternoon teas. "Too rough on the nerves," he said. "Here's the situation: I gotta hold a sandwich in my mouth, a plate of cake in one hand, a cup of tea in the other and nothing to place anything on but a grand piano." Now all this is changed, and to the satisfaction of all concerned.

OVER in London I read that when it is desired to comment on a person's gracefulness it is the proper thing to compare it with "the McLoughlin Glide."

This is the term The Daily News' tennis expert applies to the footwork of Morris McLoughlin, the American tennis champion, who has been playing over there.

The Daily News man writes enthusiastically of this American player, who "just glides about the court with that perfect, rhythmical ease that is ever so appealing. We saw in his match with Roper Barrett, at the moments when the latter's big brain had checked the rhythm of McLoughlin's gliding feet, a man who could smile at the coup on the part of the opposition and concentrate rageless and benignly, rippling on through to the open sea of success.

"The McLoughlin glide is quite the most delightful thing we have seen for years, if ever, in the game of lawn tennis, and for the man and the manner we tender our gratitude to the United States."

KIMBALL PIANOS

The Artist's Ideal

Beyond a doubt the best way to get a genuine bargain in a piano is to go to a responsible house and pay a fair price for an instrument with a reputation back of it.

You should not consider for one moment that cheap pianos which are advertised in such convincing terms are worth spending money for. If you buy one, you are speculating with most of the chances against you. Whether you buy here or elsewhere, secure a standard make or save your money.

The cost of making a piano such as the KIMBALL is greater than the selling price of most cheap pianos, which are as a rule not good even when new.

A piano with excellent staying qualities of tone and construction is the only one worth considering and you had better pay a little more and know that as long as you have it you will be pleased with it.

By this we do not mean that you will have to spend an exorbitant sum to obtain a satisfactory instrument, but we do wish to caution you against ones sold at a price for which it is impossible to give you a piano of real merit.

We wish to caution you against buying a piano from a concern that has a sliding scale of prices. The one-price plan on which we operate is the only sure way of your securing full value. We have found in many years of experience that to be fair to ourselves and the customer is the only correct selling method.

In the REALM of CLUBDOM

Mrs. Henry Bernard Scott

Who took part in the recent performance given by the Players' Club, and who is much interested in the advancement of art. Mrs. Scott is an active member of the Atlanta Art Association, and presides over a very artistic home.

MRS. M'DOWELL WOLFF TO CELEBRATE BIRTHDAY.

THE 11th of July will be the seventy-third birthday of Mrs. McDowell Wolff. Mrs. Wolff is one of the leading clubwomen of Atlanta, and belongs to one of the oldest and most prominent families of Virginia, her native State.

Since her residence in Atlanta Mrs. Wolff has been living with her son, Dr. Bernard Wolff, in Peachtree Place, where, surrounded by her flowers and the grandchildren she adores, she passes her days happily.

Few clubwomen in the patriotic societies have as interesting history as has Mrs. Wolff. She was brought up in the Governor's Mansion, where her father, Governor James Preston, served the State of Virginia, and made his home the meeting place of the great men of that time.

Mrs. Wolff counted as friends and acquaintances such men as Henry Clay, Daniel Webster, John C. Calhoun and many of the South's foremost statesmen, in her youth. Dolly Madison was a cousin of Mrs. Wolff, and it was at that beautiful woman's home that Mrs. Wolff made a delightful visit shortly before her death.

Recently Mrs. Wolff has had as her guest her grandson, Arthur Preston Krug, of South America, who has been attending the Woodberry College in Virginia. Later in the season Mrs. Krug, daughter of Mrs. Wolff, will go to the New England States, where she will be joined by Mrs. Wolff.

Mrs. Wolff tells the following delicious story of child love, which has met its reward in a most charming manner already:

"I was not feeling very well," said Mrs. Wolff, "and was sitting at the tea table with my head resting on my hand. Bernard Wolff, my little 3-year-old grandson, must have caught the dejection of my attitude, for he looked at me a moment, then said: 'Grandmother, you look very poor tonight.' I told him I felt like a pauper, to which he replied: 'But you are not,' waving his little hands around the table where the family sat. 'These are your people. You are not poor. And then, Grandmother, God gave ME to you.'"

In the family of the Wolffs is a set of silver goblets, which have always been called the Kings Mountain Silver, since they were purchased with the pension money paid the widow of her grandfather, one of the heroes of Kings Mountain. The silver was distributed among the family, and it is Mrs. Wolff's goblet that is being engraved with the conversation between little Bernard Wolff and his grandmother, to be presented to that little fellow, in appreciation of his loving remarks to his devoted grandmother.

Mrs. Wolff is the founder of the Children of the Confederacy, was first vice president of the Daughters of the Confederacy and is an active member of the D. A. R.

At her last visit to Princeton Mrs. Wolff was escorted from Nassau Hall, where the Fourth of July ceremonies were conducted, by Woodrow Wilson, who was at that time Governor Wilson.

As her seventy-third birthday draws near Mrs. Wolff retains all the youthful vigor and girlish enthusiasm that has made her life so filled with stirring and interesting events.

Y. W. C. A. TRIES TO AID BREADWINNERS

ONE of the most effectual works being done by the club women of Atlanta is that which throws around the breadwinner the right sort of environment and provides the unprovided with a safe shelter and proper food and companionship.

This is being done by the Young Women's Christian Association, which hopes in the near future to have a suitable home for the young women who are in a way their protegees.

For the present the work of the Young Woman's Christian Association is being directed by a board, and plans are being made to find a desirable place where the work of the exchange, the cafe and the domestic regime can go on smoothly. By autumn the association will have everything well under way, and a comfortable and well ordered home is looked for where the self-supporting young woman can have a place for wholesome recreation and a real home atmosphere, after her business hours.

Mrs. Charles J. Haden, president of the City Federation has been made a member of the Young Women's Christian Association Board and with her experience and talents will carry great strength to the work of furthering the plans of that association.

The retiring president, Mrs. James Jackson, has been connected with the work for several years and has been one of the most efficient club women in the State, having held high office in many of the leading clubs.

CLUBWOMEN TO ASK FOR GIRLS' REFORMATORY.

THE clubwomen of Georgia are being urged to agitate the question of a girls' reformatory with the present General Assembly and use all their influence to get an appropriation for such an institution, which is much needed in the State, they claim.

The establishment and maintenance of the institution would mean a great deal to the future generations of young girls who are thrown out into the world by adversity and who have none of the safeguards thrown around them, and there are clubwomen enough in the State to make such an institution a pride and ornament to the State and a monument to the clubwomen.

This movement is backed by the ablest clubwomen in the federation, the Southern Branch of College Women having the work as one of its especial endeavors. Of this association Miss Rhoda Kauffman is president.

The establishment of a girls' reformatory is dear to the hearts of all clubwomen in Georgia, and every energy is being put forward to bring the bill favorably before the Legislature.

GEORGIA WOMEN ARE INTERESTED IN KNOXVILLE EXPOSITION.

EVERY effort is being put forward to make the National Conservation Exposition, to be held in Knoxville in the fall, one of the most progressive and up-to-date exhibits ever promoted in the South.

Many of the foremost women in the South are engaging in the plan to bring forward their health and civic work, and the value of conserving the materials at our doors will be stressed. There will be commercial and industrial features to the exhibition, but the educational features will be in the lead.

The Girls' Canning Club will have a building in the shape of a big red tomato, and there they will give daily demonstrations of the profitable work they are doing. There will be a Child-Welfare Building, where everything that pertains to the health and development of normal and healthy children will be demonstrated. This building will be under the direction of Miss Julia Lathrop, of Washington, assisted by Dr. Frances Bradley, of Atlanta, who is at the head of many of the civic and health enterprises of the city, and is a prominent clubwoman.

The design of the exposition is to show the natural wealth of minerals, land, animals and forests in the South and how they can be used as a profit and benefit to the public at large.

The exposition will be held three miles from Knoxville, in the foothills of Smoky Mountains, where there is a beautiful well-wooded park.

Mrs. Horace Van Deventer is at the head of the Woman's Department, and is a women well known in the social and club life of Atlanta, Washington, Knoxville, New York and other large cities where she has been extensively entertained. During a recent visit to Washington, where Mrs. Van Deventer went in the interest of the Conservation Exposition, she obtained the active co-operation of the following women who will aid her in the work of making the Woman's Department a great success: Mrs. John Hays Hammond and Mrs. Archibald Hopkins, of the National Civic League; Mrs. Martha A. Gielow, of the Southern Industrial Educational Society; Mrs. Peckham, president of the National Needlework Guild, and Mrs. McGuire, president of the Children's Hospital; Miss Jessie Wilson and her sister, Miss Margaret Wilson.

Following are the officers of the Woman's Department: President, Mrs. Horace Van Deventer; first vice president, Mrs. C. D. Boyd; second vice president, Mrs. W. S. Shields; third vice president, Mrs. J. Y. Johnston; fourth vice president, Mrs. G. W. Denny; fifth vice president, Mrs. W. W. Woodruff, and secretary, Miss Louise A. Neilson.

There will be inaugurated a Safety League Day, when the ladies will organize the first branch of the American Museum of Safety in the South. This is an organization for children.

A number of Atlanta women will attend the exposition and take part in the various department programs. Another feature of the exposition will be the Literary Department and Library of Southern Writers.

DECATUR SEWING CLUB EXTENDS ITS SCOPE.

THERE are a number of interesting clubs in Decatur, among which is the Young Girls' Sewing Club, organized several years ago by Miss Mamie Branch Powers, who was its first president. The members of the Young Girls' Sewing Society had never done other than fashion little doll clothes, but when they organized into a real society it was decided that something more useful be engaged in, and the children began making aprons and simple, but useful, things for charitable purposes, and as the society has grown its usefulness has increased.

There was at one time a charming literary club in Decatur, with the following members: Mr. and Mrs. Albert Cox, Dr. and Mrs. Gaines, Dr. Armstead, Miss Massey, Mr. and Mrs. Drury Powers, Mrs. Kate Winn Kirkpatrick and Mr. and Mrs. Hooper Alexander.

The U. D. C. has a chapter at Decatur, and there is a tennis and dramatic club. The civic improvement clubs are doing a good work in the town, and there is a cooking club, the Boy Scouts and the Camp Fire Girls, organized by Mrs. Perry. The young people have a dramatic club, with Edward VanValkenburg as president, and there are several social clubs among the women and young people.

The Halcyon Club has its own dancing hall.

WOMEN'S CLUBS AID IN CELEBRATING FOURTH.

THE greatest activity in the club world of Atlanta this week has been the celebration of the glorious Fourth of July, when all the patriotic societies took part with Bishop Nelson at St. Philip's Cathedral in celebrating the day with religious ceremonies.

The order of celebrating the Fourth as is now enjoyed was inaugurated by the Atlanta Chapter D. A. R. Later it became one of the regular days set apart for celebration, and since then the services have been held in St. Philip's Cathedral.

The Joseph Habersham, the largest patriotic chapter in the city, and the Atlanta chapter, the oldest, took part in the program on Friday with Bishop Nelson, who conducted the services.

On the evening of the same day the Joseph Habersham Chapter gave a delightful dancing party at the new Ansley Hotel, when a musical program was enjoyed and dancing was the feature of the program later in the evening. Refreshments were served and a goodly sum was added to the chapter house fund from the admission fee, which was fixed at $1.

The Joseph Habersham Chapter has given a number of entertainments during the spring and summer and has always devised the most attractive methods to interest the public.

In the early spring Miss Mildred Rutherford gave one of the most pleasing programs ever attempted in Atlanta for the Joseph Habersham Chapter. Later there was a Mother Goose Pageant and now the Tango Tea, which introduced a new drink, called the Eleanor Mint, a refreshing summer drink named for the daughter of Woodrow Wilson.

The Atlanta Chapter D. A. R., with Mrs. J. O. Wynn as regent, gave a beautiful lawn party at the country home of Governor and Mrs. John M. Slaton last week, and this chapter has other plans for entertaining that will add greatly to the social calendar.

In the early fall the United Daughters of the Confederacy will begin a series of social tens and other entertainments, for the purpose of raising funds for a new chapter house. This chapter is the only U. D. C. chapter in Atlanta, and has a splendid membership, with Mrs. Williams McCarthy as president.

MARTHA BERRY SCHOOL PLANS MORE ROOM FOR GIRLS.

WHILE most of the clubs are taking a holiday, and their members enjoying the sea breezes, or the peace of the mountains, there is an institution in North Georgia that is moving along uninterruptedly and making more secure the foundation upon which it is built.

The institution is the Martha Berry School, which has long since become one of the prides of the State.

When the school was first established by the unselfish effort of Miss Martha Berry it was designed for boys alone. But there has been an increasing demand for a place where girls could be given the proper training, and a girls' school has been added to that of the boys.

Girls are taught all the practical things that go to making women useful, and, above all, happy, for Miss Berry's belief is that work brings happiness.

Next year Miss Berry hopes to be in position to accommodate a hundred girls. At present the girls are taught sewing, housekeeping, conservation, basketry and all the things that pertain to the home.

An Atlanta Circle has been formed, with Mrs. Frank Inman as president, and in honor of that charming woman the first building erected on the girls' campus was named Louise Hall for her.

Mrs. John W. Grant is vice president, Mrs. Roby Robinson treasurer, Mrs. Hollins Randolph corresponding secretary and Mrs. TenEyke Brown recording secretary.

This Atlanta Circle of the Martha Berry School has done a splendid work for the school and will enlarge its scope of action next year when the circle takes up its work again.

A number of prominent people have become interested in the school and have contributed to its upkeep. Among those interested are John J. Eagan, Robert Maddox, Henry S. Johnston, J. K. Orr, of Atlanta, and V. E. Macy, of New York; Dr. Albert Shaw, George W. Perkins, of New York, and Miss Sallie Eugenia Brown, of Atlanta. William Taft, when President of the United States, took a lively interest in the Berry School and one of the last things for him to do, was to write a letter of greeting and encouragement to the children being educated in the school.

The first lessons of life are taught in the school. The secret of happiness which lies in unselfishness and the value of keeping the heart and mind free of unwholesome thoughts. The motto of the school is, "Not to be ministered to, but to minister unto others."

The next meeting will be held the third Monday in July. Nelson officiated at the service on Friday morning, and read the Declaration of Independence. Dean C. T. A. Pise assisted in the service, which was largely attended.

All members of all local chapters of the Daughters of the American Revolution had been invited to participate, and a good representation was had from each chapter. Special invitations were extended Governor and Mrs. John Marshall Slaton, J. Randolph Anderson, Speaker of the House, and Mrs. Anderson. The national hymns were sung, and there was a program of organ music by Charles Sheldon.

Dean C. T. A. Pise and his young son, Allison, have returned home after a tramp of 100 miles, followed by a camping party in the mountains of North Georgia. Frank Moses and son, Willie Moses, of St. Philip's, were also members of this party.

The Junior Auxiliary will continue its meetings throughout the summer. Miss Mary King is director of this society.

A lawn party was given Wednesday afternoon and evening on the church lawn by the members of the auxiliary. When Mozart Bowed Before the Boy Beethoven

(Stirring Stories of Great Musicians. No. 7.)

AWKWARD, ill-clothed, the boy entered the room that was to him a shrine. He had come far to see the world's great master, to beg a word of encouragement.

He sat at the piano, awkward still, his smouldering eyes fixed with grim intensity upon the other's. He wished to see his triumph. But as he watched, the light went out from the other's face. It grew uninterested.

Grimly the boy played on, but he knew his failure. He had learned his piece too well, its witchery was gone. Then with a crash, he suddenly ceased.

"Give me a theme" he pleaded. The great musician did so, unwilling to hurt him who had failed.

Grimly still, almost sullenly, the youth commenced again. And then the magic from his fingers came, tracing their mastery in immortal sound. Slow the tones grew. Slowly they faded, like a soft regret, faded and were still.

Slowly the man rose, reverently he bowed.

"Boy, thou art great," he said, "the world will hear of thee."

It was the tribute of the setting to the dawning Sun of Genius—the Great Man to the Great Boy. It was Mozart's tribute to Beethoven.

* * * * *

Have you a boy who hummed little airs at play when he was tiny? That boy has musical talent, and you are responsible for developing it.

Have you given him a musical chance, with a musical education, on a good piano? Or have you already ruined his ear by giving him the "cheap tone" habit of a cheap piano?

The delicate brain cells connected with the ear take bad "sound habits" quickly, which can't be lost. That is why an English cockney misplaces his "h," or a street boy loves a squeaking harmonica. The will develop your boy's "musical liking" by developing his ear to true tones. The great musicians Liszt and Johann Strauss recommended it. His Holiness Pope Pius X endorsed it with a Papal medal.

Why don't you give your boy or girl a musical chance, by giving them a Hallet & Davis Piano?

It's our business to show you how you can afford it. You'll be surprised to learn how low-priced these high-grade instruments are and what Easy Payments will secure one. Call at the store for full information on prices and terms today.

For Milady's Wardrobe

By MME. HAUTE MONDE.

A NOVELTY of the season is the long glove of dark gray suede worn with white or pale tinted muslins. The innovation looks rather odd at first sight, but is really charming and artistic.

With the exaggeratedly decollete necks short sleeves are worn in the house. Sometimes the arms are covered with fine lace mittens, but far more often they are left bare, save for a veiling of tulle illusion. Here I must again mention that scarfs of tulle illusion are worn at all hours of the day and with almost every kind of costume.

Many of the newest rest gowns are accordion pleated from waist to hem, the material used being fine muslin or equally fine Indian silk. Then a picture mantle of lace or pale tinted chiffon is thrown in; a wide sash is wound round the waist; sweet-scented flowers are arranged at the breast and the boudoir cap is donned.

Leghorn is immensely popular this year, not only for dressy summer millinery, but also for simple tailored hats to be worn with linen and cotton frocks of the same genre, or with light tailored wool suits. They are deliciously comfortable and easy on the head, and will encroach on the field in which Panamas hitherto have reigned alone. The latter are shown in new shapes this season, a Panama sailor being one of the novelties.

All Panamas are smaller, the inclination being to a medium size, with a mannish crown and a comparatively narrow brim turned down part way around. Another popular shape is almost exactly that of the regular farmer's straw hat, rolling at the sides. Plain ribbon bands are tied in a flat bow, with ends falling onto the brim. The ribbon loops, characteristic of the season's millinery, are used on some of the Panamas also, but are placed at the left side toward the back.

A great deal of moire is worn this season, both black and colors. Lovely shades are obtainable in lime green, deep cream, blue, dull gold and gray. For a smart tailored suit moire makes an admirable selection.

The French and the English have invented charming fashions for the child in the house, but it is to our own American designers that the child who wants to have the time of its young life in outdoor play must come to be ideally fitted. The beach rompers shown this season are enough to make one sigh to be made a child again. Beach aprons are a boon, too. They are made of blue denim, bound with red and embroidered (also in red) with the appropriate emblems of pail, shovel, and so forth. The pail design, planted squarely in the middle of the apron, is in reality a large pocket, which will certainly be the joy of the wearer.

Many girls from 14 years of age and upward are wearing white ninon or cotton crepe skirts with basqued coats of soft satin or silk embroidered round the edge and upper portion of the sleeve. These coats, which cross over to the left and fasten with two silk-covered buttons, have a soft frill of net or lace down the front, while the low turn-down collar has a bow of black velvet as a finish, the waist belt being embroidered in wool or floss silk. In willow and lizard green, pale blue, lavender and dull pink such coats look most effective with white skirts.

The inexpensive negligee gown for hot weather is of sheer stuff, and is usually white, or shows a floral pattern in delicate colors on a white ground. For these models, aside from the kimono, variations of the Empire effect are, perhaps, most in evidence, wide liberty satin ribbons run through wide embroidery beading, serving as a girdle and giving to the model more trimness than is common to robes which fall loose from the shoulders. The flowered muslin negligees are, as a rule, little trimmed, save for frills of Valenciennes lace to soften the edges.

Quite a feature of the season's styles is the little cutaway corsage that has a suggestion of the postilion back. This is generally made over a cream net corsage. At all events, the ensemble looks like a little coat put over a summer vest or blouse; but it is really all made in one. Sometimes the sleeves are of net, mousseline, or tulle illusion, and sometimes of the material of the cutaway, satin, silk, shantung or pongee.

This summer veils will be long and worn loosely flowing over the face. Frail shadow laces are in favor for them and washable Shetland of a filmy quality. Some have an open mesh over the face, and the design of the veil is not carried over the open weave part. These are named "frame veils" and are most of them woven of Italian silk.

Summer is the season for embroidery, and the woman who puts in her spare moments in the preparation of dresses for the little folks will have cause for thanksgiving later on. Most children now wear cotton frocks the year around. It is a far more cleanly custom than putting a child into a blue serge suit when autmun comes and having it wear the suit day after day as long as the threads will hold together.

It is predictd now that the Eton jacket and the bolero will have a prominent place in juvenile fashions next winter. These will be embroidered or braided in gay colors and will be charming on children. The embroidery can be done this summer by the woman who is clever with her needle.

WHEN WILL THE LIMIT OF DARING IN WOMAN'S DRESS BE REACHED?

HARDLY a day passes that the newspapers of the country do not contain accounts of some daring innovation in woman's dress. Between the transparent dress and the split skirt there is little left to the imagination.

The picture on the right is that of a gown offered for sale in one of the largest New York department stores. It is an importation from France, and after it was placed on view the manager of the department received orders for a number of similar costumes. It is very aptly named "the exposee gown." This gown is priced from $850 to $1,100.

The vogue of these split-skirt gowns has caused the makers of fashion's decree to concentrate their attention upon novelties in hosiery. Dispatches from Paris tell us that some startling effects in stockings are to be seen where the split skirt flourishes.

Hosiery bearing embroidered snakes, birds, butterflies and even mottoes were seen. Most of the stockings were pink, although some were white, and even a few purple and green ones were seen. Those bearing the reptilian decorations were so marked that it would appear that the snakes were twined about the leg, head downward.

Bands of diamonds and other precious jewels were used for decorative purposes. Many had the heels of their shoes covered with pearls, rubies and diamonds.

World's Latest and Most Radiant Gowns Make Grand Prix Year's Fashion Event

By CHARLES HENRY MELTZER

Special Cable to The American.

PARIS, July 5.—There was hardly standing room on the great Longchamps race course Sunday afternoon when the Grand Prix was won by the French colt Bruleur in the presence of quite 500,000 onlookers and in record time. The four reserved stands overflowed. The paddock was a feminine flower garden. The vast "pelouse" was one moving mass of eager and happy or unhappy mortals.

The verdant slopes and white roads surrounding the course were thronged with spectators, while in the alleys of the Bois contented bourgeois picnicked gayly. President Poincare, who was accompanied by Mme. Poincare and his civil and military attaches, had a whole-hearted welcome when he drove up in a dashing open carriage preceded by a lackey in a blue and gold livery.

Mrs. Belmont's Fine Gown.

Hundreds of private turnouts and 6,000 or more hired autos and victorias filled the approaches to the course with life and movement. The weather was ideal, bright and fair.

Mrs. Perry Belmont wore an exquisite black and white creation, black satin being chosen for the dress. Over this were a lovely tunic and corsage of cream-colored lace. She wore a black hat with rare white aigrettes.

The Duchess de Brissac looked charming in a gown made almost entirely of black chantilly lace over white. The bodice was of the same lace, draped over flesh-tinted chiffon and tulle, while the skirt was draped with several deep flounces of black chantilly. A small black hat trimmed with white ospreys completed the costume.

Unusual Elegance Shown.

Mrs. Frank J. Gould looked very fetching in a creation of maline lace over delicate pearl pink chiffon, the lace falling in softly draped folds onto the plain and rather transparent chiffon skirt. On the bodice were several touches of Mandarin-colored satin.

The costumes in the paddock and the stands were of unusual elegance and on the whole less startling than on other Grand Prix days. Black and white greatly predominated in the color schemes. Nearly all the best dressed women wore gowns of chiffon and lace, in many cases white chiffon being trimmed with black chantilly.

Some of the most charming tunics and bodices were softly draped in lace over flesh-colored chiffon. In every case the bodices were transparent, and the sleeves very short.

Skirts Show Hosiery.

Skirts were draped gracefully and almost invariably open in front, as far as the knee, revealing the silk hosiery below quite plainly.

Madame Poincare was beautifully gowned in white mousseline de soie with a mousseline mantle embroidered in black and trimmed with bands of ermine.

She had small white Mandarin silk stockings and satin shoes of white lent piquancy to the costume.

The Princess Murat made a fascinating picture in a tasteful gown of black and white, relieved at the waist with violet satin. The black satin skirt was draped with soft malines lace, while the bodice was a dainty mixture of lace and tulle. Her hat was of black velvet.

Despite the glowing sun, most of the hats at Longchamps were of velvet or satin. This marks a new departure. Formerly all the hats one saw on days like this were made of straw or tulle.

Mrs. W. K. Vanderbilt was dressed in black chantilly lace over white. The bodice was of the same lace, draped over flesh-tinted chiffon and tulle, while the skirt was draped with several deep flounces of black chantilly. A small black hat trimmed with white ospreys completed the costume.

Mrs. Bower Ismay was attired in a white and black gown with gold lace showing beneath the white chiffon and a white hat with white ospreys. Mrs. Chauncey Depew appeared in pale pink chiffon and malines lace. Above this was a black chantilly lace hat. Mrs. B. Cummings wore white lace over black chiffon.

Mrs. Cornelius Vanderbilt, Jr., also arrayed herself in black lace and white chiffon. The costume chosen by Mrs. McClelland was an effective pale blue charmeuse creation, worn with a white lace hat, trimmed with ospreys.

Many Americans There.

The Marchesa de Radini de Labouchere was dressed in black charmeuse with a cerise sash embroidered in black and a black velvet hat, with a violet feather. Mrs. George Harrison wore mauve satin trimmed with lace. Her hat was of same material and color.

Mrs. W. Lewischn looked smart in a handsome black chantilly lace gown glittering with diamonds.

Among many other Americans noticed at Longchamps were Mrs. Louise Sands, Mr. and Mrs. H. Wertheim, H. B. Duryea, Mr. and Mrs. F. Gray, Mr. and Mrs. S. Howland, Mr. and Mrs. Charles F. Garland, Mrs. and Miss Gilbert, Hamilton Carhardt, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Crocker, Sherwood Aldrich, Mr. and Mrs. George Blumenthal, August Belmont, Harry Lehr, and Mr. and Mrs. John W. Barrett.

Jewels on Their Stockings.

The French fashionables present included Comte de la Rochefoucauld, Comte de Brimont, Marquis de Ganay, Marquis de Gallifet and Prince Murat.

Shoes and stockings of the most vivid hues enlivened the paddock. Some were of violet, some of pink, others of golden tones. In many instances the hosiery was richly embroidered with designs in jewelry. As for shoes, the heels were so high that their owners almost seemed to walk on stilts.

A Stroll Through Shopland

by EVELYN WREN

MANY are the sins of omission caused by the lack of a postage stamp. The birthday card, the thank-you letter, the spontaneous note of congratulatory greeting and the helpful words of sympathy are written with promptness and then left unmailed. Many times I receive a letter full of cheer which, somehow, loses its flavor when I casually note that it was not mailed until three days after the cheer bubbled from the ink bottle.

Do not blame yourself for this oft-recurring negligence. We will all admit that it seems like a long, sunny walk to the postoffice after a morning of shopping. Often the letter remains in your bag simply because nothing reminded you that you should buy stamps. If you could see in front of you, in the center aisle of a favorite department store, the sign, "Postoffice Sub-station No. 23," you would remember to take the few necessary steps and get your letter off expeditiously.

Sub-station No. 23 is located in Rich's famous center aisle. Here you can buy stamps by the bookful, register letters and packages, send parcel post bundles and acquire postal information. This is but another instance of Rich's desire to make shoppers happy.

In this warm weather eating is necessary, but often absurdly inconvenient. Tempting food is what you most desire—food which makes your lips smack and gives your eyes a glow of anticipation. To eat dainty viands in a cool, restful atmosphere and be attended by quiet, well-trained maids is bliss supreme. That bliss can be yours as well as mine, for you, too, may go to the pretty restaurant maintained by J. M. High Company. Here you may indulge in substantial luncheS for the small sum of 25 and 35 cents. Here you may eat the celebrated Lady Baltimore cake made by Miss Nettie Howard, assistant director, and the adorable "Little Lady from Buckhead." The dainty rose bower restaurant is an oasis of pleasure after a weary half-day.

You may have several pretty frocks at the price of $2.95 and realize that the several cost you just what one would have cost earlier.

MUSIC NOTES

The first appearance as a singer before an Atlanta audience of Miss Eulalia Bright Cannon was a triumph for the young girl who won the grand opera prize of $3,000 given by a prominent New York woman for the musical education of the winner. Miss Cannon, who is a new-comer to Atlanta, sang last Sunday afternoon at the Auditorium. Her first song was, "Oh, Don Fatale," the aria from Verdi's opera and the song which won for her the prize. She also sang a number of simple English songs as encores after her two program numbers.

Miss Edith M. Hall, an Atlanta young woman, who is on the music faculty of Shorter College, has gone to New York, where she will study this summer with Raphael Joseffy. Miss Hall is a popular young musician and a valuable member of the Shorter College staff of musical instructors.

Up-to-Date Brides Are Expected to Design Own Gowns

Special Cable to The American.

LONDON, July 5.—There is really no fashion nowadays in bridal gowns. It seems to be the ambition of every bride to strike an individual note.

One of the principal brides this week, Miss Dorothy Pratt, who married the son of General Cecil Bingham, chose a gown which was simplicity itself, but entirely novel in design. It was of white satin, the skirt being put into rather full pleats just above the waist at the back and sides and turned lightly underneath at about the height of the knees.

The front of the corsage fell softly away over a long stole of white chiffon embroidered in seed pearls and silk floss, with a glimpse of gold thread, and thickly fringed with silk at the base, while there was a peep of a lace petticoat beneath. The corsage was of the same chiffon similarly embroidered, while there were long militaine sleeves, which were brought well down over the hand and wide frills at the open throat, merged into a little wired medici collar.

A point of chiffon was brought up over the tulle at the back and a great flat bow ornamented the corsage in front.

The graceful and exquisite line of the gown was enhanced by a train which flowed out from the jupe, instead of commencing on the shoulders.

Transparent Gowns To Cause New Rules

Hot Weather Blamed for Jolts to Councilmen's Modesty—Will Regulate Women's Apparel.

ROCHESTER, PA., July 5.—Following suggestions made by D. W. Denton, president of the Rochester Council, Burgess J. M. Cargo will be asked to formulate a set of rules regulating wearing apparel of women who appear on the streets of Rochester.

Denton's suggestions were made on complaints he said had been made to him about the transparency of the gowns worn by young women. A Moral Efficiency Committee was named to take the matter up with the Burgess. It is believed that the extremely hot weather of the last few days is responsible for the severe jolts which the modesty of the Councilmen have received. It was agreed by the Councilmen that women should wear enough underskirts to hide the contour of the body.

Rome to Hear Opera Of Eloping Princess

Princess Louise and Her Pseudo Husband to Attend the First Performance.

Special Cable to The American.

ROME, July 5.—Next week will see the first production of the new operetta, "Principessa Bizzarra," or "The Strange Princess," from the joint pens of Princess Louise, of Saxony, and her pseudo-husband, Signor Toselli. The libretto is by her Royal Highness, and Toselli has composed the music.

It is further stated that Right, the well-known tenor, has been engaged to play the part of the husband of the Princess in the play. An announcement that "both Princess Louise and Signor Toselli have promised to be present at the production" attracts more attention than the operetta itself.

Few court scandals have surpassed in vivid interest the stormy periods of the life of Louise of Saxony.

STAGE NOTES

ATLANTANS will have another chance to see and hear the remarkable talking moving pictures at the Grand. The Edison invention will remain at the Grand all this week. The performances will be continuous, beginning at 2:30 each afternoon and lasting until 10:30 at night.

The Keith bill of vaudeville at the Forsyth will boast of two headline numbers, Cecil Lean and company and Eva Taylor and company. The bill is one of variety.

At the Bijou the offering will be "Along Broadway," another of those snappy tabloid affairs which give opportunity for fun-making, catchy songs and up-to-the-minute dances.

Star Features on Bill at the Forsyth.

Interest in vaudeville has been wonderfully encouraged because of the delightful comfort of the Forsyth during the season of heat that has gripped Atlanta for the past two weeks and more.

The bill arranged for the week that starts with matinee to-morrow and that will continue at matinee and night performances all the week, is an ideal combination of Keith vaudeville.

There are to be two headline features —Cecil Lean and company in his satire, "The Moving Picture Man," and Eva Taylor and her company in "After the Wedding," a farce sketch from the pen of Lawrence Gratton.

Cecil Lean is a musical comedy star who has never appeared before in this city. He is a great favorite in many cities. Eva Taylor is another distinguished player who has not been seen in Atlanta. Miss Taylor has won favor with her sketches in many places.

Warren and Blanchard are sure to get a big welcome. Fred Warren's last visit here was more than a year ago, but there are people who have not forgotten that he is one of the funniest "Darktown Belles" on the stage.

Houghton, Morris and Houghton, a trio of excellent trick bicycle riders, will present a novelty act, and the pretty Grey Sisters will sing and dance. Hines and Fox are singers and piano players, and Kennedy and Melrose will bounce around the stage in unique gymnastic exercises that should be of more than ordinary interest.

The bill appears to be just the sort that local theatergoers like the best.

Talking Pictures Remain at Grand.

Edison's talking pictures will be continued for another week at the Grand, in connection with the standard high grade first-run pictures that made such interesting programs last week. There will be a complete change of talking pictures for Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday, and new subjects will be introduced for Thursday, Friday and Saturday.

There will be a continuous performance each day, beginning at 2:30 p. m. and lasting until 10:30 p. m.

That a great many people in Atlanta were skeptics before the introduction of this picture is a fact. No one could conceive that it was possible to perfect a machine that would produce a picture and voice in perfect synchronism. Those who have attended a performance at the Grand the past week have been convinced that Mr. Edison has accomplished the seemingly impossible.

"Along Broadway" Is Bijou Offering.

The weekly change of musical comedy attractions at the Bijou are bringing a series of entertainments full of novelty, up-to-date comedy, good music and all the other pleasing qualities of an excellent musical comedy show, and the musical comedy tabloid has found instant favor with patrons of amusement.

For the week beginning to-morrow afternoon the management announces the booking of the merry musical revue entitled "Along Broadway." The leading comedy character is that of an English lord, played by Will Stanton, a comedian of unusual ability, whose original methods of fun-making have won for him the distinction of being one of the cleverest comedians in vaudeville. Another pleasing feature will be the violin solo work of Miss Margaret Calvert. There will also be in the vaudeville interruptions soft and wooden shoe dancing by Ingalls, Duffield and Ingalls, a baritone specialty by Miss Perry, harmony singing by the Madison Sisters, and the famous tango dance by Ernest Ingalls and Miss Hite.

Matinees daily at 3 o'clock, and night performances at 7:30 and 9. On Monday and Saturday, two matinees are given at 2:30 and 4.

Fashion Hints

Almost heel-less are the ultra-smart English walking boots in mannish style. These boots have pointed, receding toes, low buttoned tops and heels scarcely lift the foot above the pavement. These new boots are delightfully comfortable, but they are neither graceful nor dainty and look best in tan leather accompanying tailored or athletic garb. Patent leather boots, with buttoned tops of gray suede or dull black kid, are much more attractive with soft, draped skirts, and with white frocks white buttoned boots are in order.

Roman stripes and Scotch plaids are promised for fall, and already these bright effects are creeping into summer costumes. A tailleur model for autumn is of navy blue lansdowne, with blue buttons and blue corded silk pipings at the seams of the coat. Around the hips is knotted a tasseled sash of blue and green checked taffeta.

The airy black tulle hats are extremely practical—one very good reason for their excessive popularity. The black hat may be worn with a frock of any color, and is particularly effective with white. Some of these modish black hats have pleated tulle brims and shirred black satin crowns. Again the brim may be of straw, faced with satin, and the crown of puffed tulle. A few models, worn by quite youthful women, are entirely of the black tulle, shirred closely over wire frames. Sometimes a big red rose, a pale pink or a saffron yellow rose trims the black tulle and satin hat effectively.

Some dressmakers advise their customers to dress according to the color of eyes in the daytime, and the color of the hair at night. Of course, this is not always possible, but it can be accomplished to a certain extent. But one should never forget that the complexion deserves very much attention and is invariably dressed up to. In case the hair runs in brown tones and the complexion is of a cream tint, it is a good plan to wear warm colorings—preferably yellows, red browns and deep orange yellows of the daffodil cast.

Cuts of corsages still show a slight bloused or loose effect at the waist, which is particularly noticeable in the back. The lining may be tight, but this air of comfort and indolence must be in evidence with everything. A woman who is dressed otherwise would appear too prim and precise to be admired. The large, loose-waisted beauty is the model this year, and one who has ideas of fitness or elegance at odds with all this must take a back seat. Word has come over from England, where the Versailles Festival was held last week, that the short-waisted dresses were an immense success, even on the long, tall English-woman, on whom as a rule French fashions do not sit well.

SUNDAY AMERICAN'S SPECIAL CABLE LETTERS RECEIVED FROM ALL THE GREAT CAPITALS OF EUROPE

ASQUITH PURSE IS DRAINED BY SOCIAL DUTIES

Premier Is Mentioned for Chief Justiceship to Relieve Him From Financial Strain.

By W. ORTON TEWSON.
Special Cable to The American.

LONDON, July 5.—Premier Asquith is said by his friends to be seriously considering taking the office of Lord Chief Justice of England, from which Lord Alverstone is soon to retire, so that the Premier may be assured of a permanent income for the remainder of his life. The fact is that Asquith, who was considered a while ago to be a very rich man, has been left dependent upon his salary as Premier of $25,000 a year, owing, it is said, to the extravagance of his wife.

Her father, Sir Charles Tennant, settled on her a dowry of $500,000 in 1895, and Asquith, who had been earning $100,000 a year as a lawyer, had a large sum in accumulated savings, but Mrs. Asquith has spent every cent of this.

Government Pays for Parties.

The financial demand of the Premier is now so great that he is compelled to charge to the Government the cost of the receptions given in his official residence in Downing Street.

The public accounts committee of the House of Commons, which goes carefully through every item of national expenditure, refused to pass an item of $850 for an entertainment given at Downing Street. It was really one of Mrs. Asquith's receptions to her intimate friends, and the Premier was placed in the humiliating position of having to return the sum to the national exchequer.

Although when the Liberal government went out of office in 1895 Asquith, who had been home secretary, returned to his practice at the bar, he can not well do so now after having been Prime Minister. Therefore he must find himself one of the high judicial posts. The best, next to that of Lord Chancellor, is the Lord Chief Justiceship, which pays $40,000 a year.

Churchill Needs Salary.

Nearly all Asquith's colleagues are perturbed by the possibility of losing at the next election their salaries of $25,000 a year, especially Winston Churchill, who has always lived well and is absolutely dependent on his salary.

John Burns is about the only member of the Cabinet who is unmoved. He never increased the scale of his expenditure, which is $1,500 a year, and has saved nearly all of his salary. The only difference his Cabinet office has made to him is that he now rides home in a taxicab instead of the trolley car which he used to patronize.

French Prince Wins Miss Draper

Wealth Fails to Catch Englishman

Little Noble Is Always in Her Train

Miss Margaret Draper, daughter of Mrs. William Draper, of Washington, who is to become the wife of Prince de la Tour D'Auvergne.

Ambitious Mother Examines Market for British Husband, but Finally Decides on LaTour D'Aurergne.

LONDON, July 5.—Mrs. William Draper, of Washington, is about to announce the engagement of her daughter, Margaret, to the Comte De La Tour D'Auvergne, a young Frenchman who became the Prince De La Tour D'Auvergne on the death of his father.

The Count is now in the Draper train at the Ritz and Mrs. Draper and her daughter are seldom seen without him. Mrs. Draper has looked over the market for British husbands, but evidently found nothing satisfactory.

Even Miss Draper's reputation as an heiress of enormous wealth failed to attract the right kind of titled Englishman. At recent American balls in London Miss Draper always had the little Count at her elbow.

PARIS DOCTORS OUTLINE WAR ON CONSUMPTION

Lively Fight Is Waged Between Hammerstein, Gatti-Casazza and Campanini for Barrientos.

By CHARLES HENRY MELTZER.
Special Cable to The American.

PARIS, July 5.—After discussions which had lasted for nine months, the French Academy of Medicine has reached the decision that all cases of tuberculosis should be reported to a doctor sworn to professional secrecy and that the sufferers, if too poor to pay for treatment, should be cared for by the powers that be, gratuitously. Though the decision only points the way to a much needed and beneficent reform, it has great weight and will no doubt be made effective by the legislative.

Chief credit for whatever good may follow goes to Dr. Roux, director of the Pasteur Institute.

Apart from the project for founding a French Theater in New York already published, I understand that a second scheme of an entirely different kind is being talked of here for permitting hungry Americans to feast on good drama. Details will be made public later.

Arthur Hammerstein, who is still in Paris, tells me he has quite given up his old business to assist his Socratic, or as some might say, his Diogenic father in his opera campaign. He also informs me that he, not Jacques Coini, is now his father's official representative in Europe.

Claims Soprano's Contract.

It has already been stated and denied with solemn emphasis that Madame Barrientos, the charming and gifted coloratura soprano, who made such an impression this spring at the Theater Champs Elysees, has been engaged by Arthur Hammerstein.

Arthur Hammerstein explained the case to-day.

"Madame Barrientos," said he, "is now in South America. We have engaged her by cable and to clinch the contract I have deposited $8,000 in the Credit Lyonese.

"Gatti-Casazza is furious and has cabled Madame Barrientos, as I hear, to try to stop the engagement. Mr. Astruc, of Paris, who is the lady's agent, has been dragged into the controversy. The fact is that Barrientos was repeatedly offered to Gatti-Casazza and Campanani, but they both missed their chance."

Mr. Hammerstein also assured me that while his father might be unable to attempt more than one performance in English weekly, during his first season on the east side, he stood firm in his resolve to devote his future energies to establishing the use of our vernacular in opera.

Three Novelties Promised.

Three novelties promised for next season at the Opera Comique are: "The Three Days" of Bruneau; "The Celeste Prudhommet" of a new composer named Tretret, and "Love in a Faubourg" of Charpentier, whose "Julien" will be revived In October.

The only novelty of importance announced at the opera house is Wolf Ferrarri's "Jewels of the Madonna," the production of which was postponed owing to the breakdown of Mary Garden.

Open-air opera at nominal prices, the sort of opera which, according to Mayor Gaynor, New Yorkers do not want, is again drawing thousands nightly to the Tuileries Gardens, where, for some years, it has been justly popular.

PARIS PACKING FOR HEGIRA TO EUROPE'S SPAS

Americans Are Prominent at Entertainments Which Follow Gayeties of Grand Prix Week.

Special Cable to The American.

PARIS, July 5.—A great stillness has succeeded the mad whirl of the past "grand semaine." Having aired their new creations on Grand Prix day, the fashionable folk have begun to pack. Ten days from now whole tracts in Paris will be empty and holiday makers will be streaming east, west, north and south in search of health and rest.

Already many have left for Dieppe, Le Touquet, Biarritz, Trouville and Deuville. More crowds in turn will flock to the inland watering places. Aix Les Baines, Contrexville, Vittel, Royat and Mont d'Or will be thronged.

To be seen in Paris will convict one's self of being unfashionable.

The fete by Prince Louis D'Orleans Bourbon at the Polo Club was one of the most brilliant of the present salon functions. It ended with a tango competition presided over by Duchess De La Rochefoucauld, who was assisted by a committee, including M. Andre De Fouquires. Among the American guests were Mrs. Rutherford Stuyvesant, Mrs. Potter Palmer and Mrs. Carroll.

Fashionable Americans There.

The Grand Duchess of Mecklenburg-Schwerin was present at a recent dinner given by Count Ignatieff. Russian military attache, and Countess Ignatieff. The tables were tastefully decorated with sweetpeas, a special tint being selected for each table.

Among the guests were Grand Duke Alexander of Russia, the French Minister of War and Mme. Etienne, Comte Jacques Daramon, whose American mother was formerly the beautiful Miss Fisher, and the Comtesse Daramon, Marquise De Mun, Mrs. Moore, Mrs. Bell and Walter Kingsland.

Mrs. Rutherford Stuyvesant's dance this week brought together a number of Parisian fashionables, notably Prince Antoine D'Orleans, Princess Isenberg Birstein, Prince Eugene Murat and Duchess De La Rochefoucauld, nee Mitchell.

Andre De Fouquieres led the cotillon at the last ball of the Baron and Baroness Maurice De Rothschild, which was attended by Comte and Comtesse Paul Daramon, Mrs. Finen, formerly Anita Eustis; Mrs. Marcelin Singer, Prince Radziwill and other notables.

Mrs. Palmer's Soiree Postponed.

Mrs. Potter Palmer's soiree has been postponed until Wednesday next.

Miss De Larra, sister of the composer, gave an afternoon dance on Tuesday last, which was attended by many Americans.

Comte Boni De Castellane is still welcome at many exclusive Paris gatherings. He was one of the guests at the latest dinner and garden party given by the Duc and Duchess De Rohan, with Count Primoli, Comtesse Jacques De Pourtales, Princess Lucien Murat and Marcel Prevost, whose absurd onslaught on foreign governesses, published under the title of "Les Agnes Gardiens," is in its fifty-fifth edition.

Emperor Wilhelm Loses Interest in Yachting for Tennis

Kaiser Practices Daily on Court and Is Rapidly Becoming Skillful Player With Racquet.

Special Cable to The American.

BERLIN, July 5.—Emperor Wilhelm has become an ardent and enthusiastic tennis player and is devoting much time to acquiring proficiency in this sport. Even during the regatta at Kiel, where all interests center in yacht racing, he has been spending two or three hours daily on the courts.

Prince Henry and other yachtsmen wishing to consult him have to seek him on the prettily located courts.

As a result of his recent practice the kaiser has improved rapidly and now plays a hard and fast, though a somewhat uneven game. He is particularly good placing long swift drives from the back line.

During the week he has played in a number of singles and doubles together with the Crown Prince and Prince Adalbert, who are both tennis experts.

In a number of games contested this week he had as his partner Frauleln Kirschhoff, one of the best young woman players in the Kiel naval set.

Heir to Duchess of Roxburghe Expected

Regal Preparations Are Being Made for Arrival of First Child of American Peeress.

Special Cable to the American.

LONDON, July 5.— Preparations are now being made for the birth of the Duchess of Roxburghe's baby, which is scheduled for August.

A house at Roehampton, near Putney, has been rented so that the Duchess can take lunch and tea there in the dog days; Roehampton is only a short motor run from the town house. No royal child could be awaited with more eagerness, as the ducal wedding occurred ten years ago and no child has been yet born.

It is expected that before Queen Mary leaves London at the end of the month She will visit the American Duchess, as in recent years a warm friendship has developed between the Queen and the former May Goelet.

"Everybody's Duchess" has become the nickname of the Duchess of Somerset, who is literally the patron Duchess of rich Americans. This week she attended the ball of Mrs. Butterfield in Curzon Street and also lent prestige to a dance given by Lady Waldstein, formerly Mrs. Seligman.

American Dollars Save London Season

Few of Big British Entertainers Opened Houses, but U. S. Hosts Were Peculiarly Hospitable.

Special Cable to The American.

LONDON, July 5.—There is no doubt that Americans and American dollars alone saved the present London season from becoming a "frost." It is true London has been crowded, unusually crowded, but aside from those of the leading American and Anglo-American hostesses there have been few large entertainments.

"The thing that strikes me most about the present London society," said a prominent American visitor to-day, "is that every one seems trying to make a maximum show with a minimum expenditure. London seems filled with a tribe of young men of the best social quality, excellent family, admirable manners; in fact, all the necessary make-up of the social world, but with no money.

"The result is, they flock to every function where the price of a clean shirt insures them an excellent evening's entertainment, to say nothing of plenty to eat and drink."

American Dances at Big London Parties

Ambassador Page Among Those Present When British Fashionables See Terpsichorean Importations.

Special Cable to The American.

LONDON, July 5.—Americans divide the honors of the week as hostesses with Lady Salisbury and Lady Ashbury St. Ledgers. On Monday Mrs. Butterfield gave a ball in Curzon Street. On Thursday Lady Henry had an evening party in Carlton House Terrace, where American dances were given before the Prime Minister and Mrs. Asquith, the American Ambassador, the Earl and Countess of Granard, the Earl and Countess of Aberdeen, the Marchioness of Dufferin, Sir Herbert and Lady Tree, Sir George and Alexander and an interesting assembly representing all walks of life. Yesterday Mrs. Peter Kerr Stanley gave a house warming in Belgrave Square.

MOTHER KEEPS WALES TIED TO APRON STRINGS

Prince Joins Rollicking Oxford Club, but Queen Makes Him Resign—Can't Speed Auto.

By HERBERT TEMPLE.
Special Cable to The American.

LONDON, July 5.—Queen Mary seems determined to keep her oldest son under her wings until the day when she turns him over to the tender cares of his bride. Not long ago he received permission to become a member of the Bullingdon Club, with the express stipulation that under no condition must he ever take part in any of the hilarious festivities of the club, which, under the name of "Bullingdon Blinds," are one of the features of college life at Oxford.

The other night, however, he could not resist the temptation, and with trembling heart he donned his evening clothes and went to the club, where he spent a few very pleasant hours.

Parents Wax Wrathy.

His presence, of course, could not remain secret, and a day or two afterward he received a very severe letter from his parents, who had just returned from their visit to the Kaiser, ordering him to hand in his resignation as a member of the Bullingdon Club immediately, and, in spite of his entreaties, he was forced to obey.

As a balm to his wounded dignity he shortly afterward received as a present from his father a beautiful automobile, accompanied by a driver's license, and driving his own car is now his principal pleasure, though it is somewhat lessened by the fact that the car is provided with a speedometer and he has had to promise his mother on his word of honor that he will never exceed the speed of twelve miles an hour, much as he would like to tear along.

Little Olaf Gets Car.

The Queen, indeed, opposed the Prince's wish for an automobile as long as she possibly could after Queen Alexandra a little over a year ago expressed her willingness to present her oldest grandson with one. But when Queen Alexandra presented little Prince Olaf of Norway with a car and permitted him to use it freely all around Sandringham, Queen Mary realized that she had been outwitted and reluctantly permitted King George to present the Prince of Wales with a fine touring car.

The question of the Prince's marriage is now becoming quite a serious one. The King and Queen both agree that their son ought to marry early in life, but they can not agree on the bride. Queen Mary desires the Prince of Wales to marry one of the Czar's daughters, but King George and Queen Alexandra, as well as her sister, the Dowager Empress of Russia, strongly oppose this idea, because of the close relationship of the two young people.

BERLIN COLONY HAS 2 FOURTH CELEBRATIONS

Harvard Club Affair Brings Together Americans From Number of Big U. S. Colleges.

Special Cable to The American.

BERLIN, July 5.—A shadow has been cast upon the American colony in Berlin by the sudden death of Miss Martha Moll, one of its best-known members. She came to Germany from Boston many years ago and was a prominent figure in the colony. She was for a time vice president of the American Woman's Club.

Reginald Werrenrath, of New York, the baritone; Frank Laforge, the American pianist and composer, and Ernesto Brumen, the Mexican pianist, were soloists at the brilliant soiree musical given by Mrs. Frances McElwee.

The Imperator brought many well-known Americans direct to Hamburg on its return from its maiden voyage across the Atlantic. Among those who arrived on the new liner or by the Kaiser Wilhelm II, were six young women from Wellesley, who are on a tour round the world under the chaperonage of Miss Marie L. Renche.

The list included also Mrs. Mary P. Stanley and Miss F. W. Stanley, of Chicago.

Many Chicago Visitors Registered.

Many Chicago visitors arrived during the week, among them E. A. Cudady, who, with his wife and family, is making a tour of Germany; Mr. and Mrs. C. P. Kimball, Mr. and Mrs. David Lewisohn.

There was no lack of opportunity for celebrating July 4. In fact, there were two celebrations, one arranged by the American colony, the other by the Berlin Harvard Club.

The colony's meeting took place as usual at the suburban resort of Gruenau. It had all the features of an old-fashioned Fourth, with running matches, baseball games and patriotic speeches at the dinner in the evening, which was served under the trees on the banks of the river.

Day Ends With Dance.

The day ended with the dance of the Harvard Club celebration, which took place on Thursday evening on the terraces of the big garden near the permanent art exhibition. It brought together representatives of a large number of American colleges, including all of the better known institutions and most of the State universities. A number of informal dinners and luncheons in honor of the day were held at various hotels and restaurants.

MANY AMERICANS AT AIX.

Special Cable to The American.

AIX LES BAINES, July 5.—Despite the busy London and the Paris seasons there have been a remarkable number of Americans here. Bookings are heavy at all hotels. Mr. and Mrs. J. Simpson, of Chicago; Mr. and Mrs. S. Shellman and family, of Los Angeles, are at the Grand.

Count Eulenburg Is Most Decorated Man

Kaiser's Court Chamberlain Has 76 Orders—Can Not Wear All of Them.

Special Cable to The American.

BERLIN, July 5.—According to an enumeration just made of orders and decorations by the Kaiser, Count Eulenburg, the imperial court chamberlain, enjoys the distinction of being the most decorated man in the world.

Many prominent Germans have received orders to the number of 30 or more, but Eulenburg possesses 76, including some of the highest in Europe. It would be a physical impossibility for him to wear them all at the same time.

Kaiser Wilhelm in the 25 years since his accession to the throne has created 28 orders or decorations of various classes.

Woman, 109, Does Not Believe In Food Fads

Celebrates Birthday By Eating Big Dinner—Walks Up Hill For Pension.

Special Cable to The American.

LONDON, July 5.—Mrs. Rebecca Clark, of High-road, Wood Green, celebrated her 109th birthday recently and was particularly cheerful at the celebration.

She rose about mid-day and ate a dinner of roast beef, potatoes and cauliflower, stewed fruit and custard, tea and a big piece of bread. "I never believed in being faddy about food," she declared. 'Eat what you fancy and you'll be all right."

Mrs. Clark still walks up the hill to the postoffice on Fridays to draw her old-age pension, and "I'm sure I'll go on doing it for many a year yet," she said.

'Ought To See Spain's Queen Dance Tango'

"Infinitely Graceful," Says Instructor, But She Fails To Speak of Royalty's Obesity.

Special Cable to The American.

LONDON, July 5.—"The Spanish Queen dances the tango with infinite grace." Miss Vacani, a noted instructor in dancing, told a number of women of the nobility at a ball given by Mrs. James McDonald, wife of the Standard Oil Viceroy in England.

"If you could see her, you would never look upon it as vulgar or impossible for the modern ballroom. She has been carefully instructed and is an able pupil."

She did not refer to the surplus weight which greatly burdens the Queen in all active exercises.

Borrowers of Royal Property Alarmed

English Queen Makes Inventory and Requests Delinquents to Return Dead King's Loans.

Special Cable to The American.

LONDON, July 5.—Queen Mary, who is a most excellent housewife, with an innate hatred of useless waste and a pronounced love of antique furniture, has been conducting a systematic search of all the boxrooms in the immense Windsor Castle, comparing the contents with the official inventory lists.

As a result she has not only unearthed a great many forgotten old treasures carelessly thrown aside under the reign of her late father-in-law, who cared nothing for antiquities, but she also has discovered that a great many valuable articles of furniture were lent to personal friends of King Edward, who have never seen fit to return them.

All these aristocratic borrowers have now received a note from the court asking them to return the things without delay, which some of them will find rather hard, having sold or given away these things, which they always looked upon as presents from the King.

The University Student

By DAVID BARROW
Chancellor University of Georgia

AT the time of the visit of the representative of The American, I was talking with a member of the Senior Class who wished to discuss with me his plans for next year, and the future. He was to be graduated in agriculture and two positions were open to him. He was undecided as to which he should accept. As he said, he was probably determining his life work at least the lines along which his life would proceed for years to come.

As soon as I had promised the desired article for The American, I returned to the conference. A telephone call, an automobile honk, and a newspaper man are the three interruptions which all of us are prompt to answer.

This young man told me that he had attended the rural graded school, studied by himself, and had four months' preparation in Young Harris. To any one even casually acquainted with educational conditions, the fact that he made his entrance examinations on this preparation is evidence that he is of strong mind and apt to learn.

After his four months at Young Harris he taught school and gathered up about five hundred dollars. This, with his earnings as salesman of aluminum ware during his vacations, has taken him through the University, and he graduates with sufficient funds ahead to furnish his house. He will need this furniture at an early date.

The accident that I was talking to this young man determined the line of this article.

The Value of College.

There seems to be confusion in the minds of many people about the colleges of our country. In my opinion the chief consideration is the student, and the right development of the student is the end of college training.

Some people seem to think that biuldings and parks are the things to be desired. They estimate the value of a college by the magnificence of its structures. This is a part of the truth but not the main truth. Fine buildings and grounds ore worth while as tending to cultivate the taste and secure the comfort of students. This is the limit of their usefulness.

There are others who seem to think that certain forms of culture and methods of procedure constitute collegiate training, and they set more value on an outline of study than on the student. The object of the college according to these men is to maintain standards and promote learning. There is some truth in this, but this is not the main truth. Standards and learning are valuable in so far as they promote growth and fix tests for the development of the student. These things are valuable as means of culture and discipline rather than abstractly valuable in a college.

A third test, much like the first, is income, endowment. It is absolutey necessary to have means in order to provide teachers, equipment, libraries; but do not conclude that money makes a college. Money provides for a college and it is necessary, but money can not make a man. Unless the income is used wisely in order to develop the student it will not make a college. It is not the salary paid, but the salary earned which makes the teacher valuable. Not the cost of equipment, but its usefulness. I believe in good grounds and buildings, I regard curriculum and standard. I greatly desire funds, but the prime consideration is the student.

Boys to Pick Peaches.

Perhaps the accident which has placed my life in a school which was established to promote good citizenship may have shaped my views. I do not know about this. I was educated and have been teaching in that State Univeristy which was the first of all the American institutions to be projected and in the charter of which it is stated: "It should therefore be among the first objects of those who wish well to the national prosperity to encourage and support the principles of religion and morality and early to place the youth under the forming hand of society, that by instruction they may be moulded to the love of virtue and good order." I am, as will be seen from this extract, within my chartered rights and duty when I consider the student as the chief end of the college.

This is not a personal memoir and the personal allusion is given to apologize for any erroneous conclusion, if my conclusion be erroneous, and, also, to explain my point of view. To seek the truth and teach the truth as seen is the vital thing in the life of a college, for this makes the student a good citizen.

Surely this is enough of platitude.

Here is a group story. At 6 p. m., June 13th, the professor who is at the head of the committee on self help had an appointment with the boys who are to pack peaches during the vacation. The manager of a large orchard had asked for fifty boys, students of the University. The request was based on the experience of three years. We considered that a great compliment had been paid us in having our students thus preferred. Dean Snelling and I were asked to be present.

Professor Fain, the chairman of the committee, advised that a leader and secretary be elected. It is, perhaps, worth noting that the President of the Senior Class was elected leader.

Professor Fain then advised the boys to present through their leader any request which they desired to lay before the manager of the orchard. He told them that he would visit them during the second week of the season and would at that time return their registration fees. He stated that there might be two vacancies. Two students who had been enrolled were doubtful, possibly might not be able to go. He gave them notice of the date of opening of the boarding house, advice about securing rates on the railroad, etc.

A Word of Good Will.

I spoke a word of good will.

Dean Snelling talked to the students about the care of their health. I wish that every young person in the land could have heard this word, for it was hardly more than a word. The strength of the talk was in the fact, which he made forcible, that health is the basis of efficiency. The meeting then adjourned. These boys are going to have a busy season and a good time.

Did you ever go to a commencement dance? Well, I do not go often but it is a sight to see. The girls come from far and near and the boys are there in numbers. They keep going until the ladies who are in charge make them go home. It is considered quite an adventure, something to be classed with an excursion to the north pole, only less rare, to "dance all night 'til broad day light and go home with the girls in the morning." I know this is reprehensible and I know that I am the reprehended. It is easier for me to check fifty or a hundred boys than for a parent to keep time on one girl. And yet people question woman's rights. I mention this phase of student life in passing. It is a fleeting phase. Perhaps I should say a flitting phase.

There is also the question of studies. This should be considered, at least incidentially. The boys do give time to studies. We do not hear so much about this, but still they study. I think one reason we do not hear so much about study is because of the use of electric lights. Our time honored friend "midnight oil" being out of busines, people by a certain rule of rhetoric, the name of which I forget, have confused the sign with the thing signified. Still, the boys study. They learn, too. I wish we could get up some saying which would be a substitute for "midnight oil" and then we could properly speak of this phase of student effort. How would this do?

Through P. M. into A. M.
His incandescents gle-am.

Yes, these boys use the current and use it to good advantage. The truth is they study more than they ever did. They are better fitted for study. I was a student in the University when Dr. White first came here. I worked in his laboratory, a room in Old College. I shall never forget, unless I lose entirely my mind and memory, how I spoiled a bran new pair of pants by spilling a beaker of boiling acid on myself. It was a time when pants, new pants especially, were an item. Nor was this my only chemical accomplishment. At present Dr. White has a large building with various assistants and many students. One of my nick-names was "Chem Lab." Now such a nickname would have no meaning. That which produces confusion in the popular mind is that study is taken as a matter of course and this causes the opinion that students do not study.

This Boy Was Perfect.

There was a Madison County boy who received "A plus," which means super-excellent, on every subject on his report. Yes, the boy was from the "Free State." This report certainly went hard with the professors. Most of them would rather have a tooth filled than give "A plus," that is if the tooth could be filled without cost. The boy did not break himself down either, because exercise is required.

I am glad to say that the studnet's stoop is no longer popular. I can remember when I affected the student's stoop, as did certain other stupid boys. The military exercises and athletic activities have killed the student's stoop. I smile when I think of my affecting this pose. I am, and always have been short and stout, and the stoop as affected by me must have looked more like the hoehand's stoop than the student's. Again I have drifted into autobiography, which I suppose is the effect of regarding myself as one of the boys.

The use of the English language both written and spoken receives much attention and the students give much time to it. I make no pretense of being an English scholar. I think the students learn to use English. They spend much time in one form and another in the practice of English. Far more than playing ball, startling as this may seem.

The debates are really edifying to one who, like myself, is reasonably busy. I can remember when Jim Whitehead shut himself up in Phi Kappa Hall and wrote out his masterly debate during twelve hours of solitary confinement. We certainly did talk about it. This was the beginning of a series of solitary confinements, which lasted for years. I mean of course the practice not any single confinement. We used to say, "He just locked himself in and stayed there till he worked out his speech," and this made him a hero.

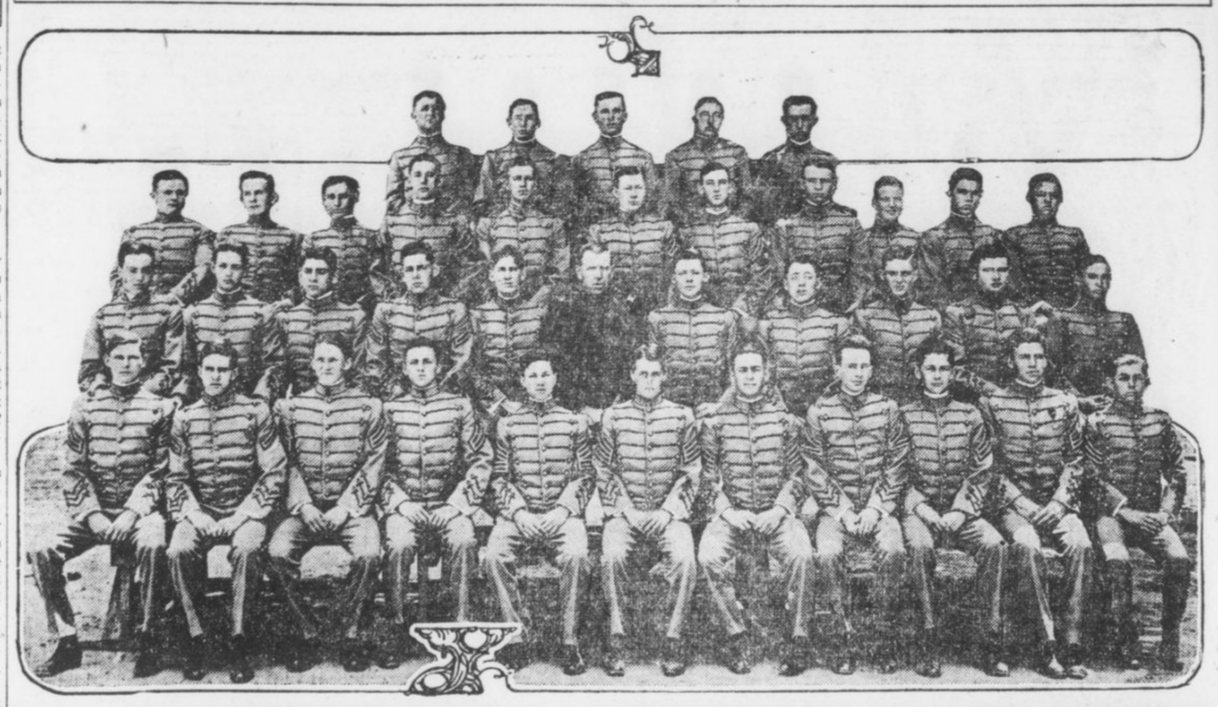
Appeal to Head, Not Feet.

The students of to-day work out their debates on an entirely different plan. The Librarian posts up pages of typewritten references. The student goes to the library night after night, day after day, working over his material. He informs himself. Then he makes an argument instead of an appeal. In place of seeking to sweep the judges off their feet, the effort is made to influence the reason of the judges. I believe this is a better, more effective, more intelligent plan. It seems to me that in debate the head of the judge rather than his feet, should be aimed at.

I write this with pleasure, because many superficial observers think foot education is attracting more attention than is proper. Sometimes I think this way myself—and am then reminded that a short, stout man, past sixty, is apt to discredit activity. These students work and play.

Governor Brown, who has had much opportunity to obesrve, and no one doubts his ability as an observer, recently said, "I am struck with the fact that the University is the most democratic place I know. A student must stand on his own merits here. Whether he comes from a rich home or a poor one, from a prominent or an obscure family he must win here by his own efforts and by the strength of his own personality." This is high praise and it comes from the Chief Executive of Georgia. I thank the Governor. I believe our "Georgia" boys merit his praise.

1913 GRADUATING CLASS OF G. M. A.



Professor Moore Is Principal

ANNOUNCEMENT of general interest in preparatory school circles is that made by the directors of the University School for Boys, at Stone Mountain, Ga., to the effect that Professor Guy A. Moore, formerly principal of Riverside Military Academy, has been named as principal of the University School for Boys and the re-election of Professor A. P. Griffin as business manager. This announcement will doubtless be received with general interest throughout the South among the friends of this preparatory school, where both of the men referred to have done such splendid work and are so well known.

Professor Moore graduated with the class of 1903 at Mercer University and was a graduate student at the University of Chicago and Harvard University.

Professor Moore was formerly in charge of the English department at the University School for Boys, where his work won for him Southern recognition in secondary schools. In addition to his service at Riverside and the University School for Boys, Professor Moore was in charge of Locust Grove Institute, at Locust Grove, Ga., during the absence of the president, and was most influential in introducing athletics into that school, and organized the Preparatory Athletic Association of Georgia.

Professor Griffin has been identified with the University School for Boys for eleven years, and the announcement that he will continue as business manager of that splendid institution will be read with interest.

Worse and Worse.

Referring to a public man's aversion to being spick and span, a country paper announced:

"Mr. Maguire will wash himself before he assumes the office of town councillor."

This made Maguire furious, and he demanded an apology, which appeared thus:

"Mr. Maguire requests us to deny that he will wash himself before he assumes the office of town councillor."

Oddly enough, this only enraged Maguire the more.

A Firm Foundation Is Half the College Course

A school famed as a successful preparatory institution is a good place for your boy to secure a foundation for his life-work. The boys who have received their preparation here are among the leaders in the ranks of young professional and business men; others are taking a high stand in college, both in the class room and on the athletic field. Twenty per cent of the students are brothers of former students.

STUDENT CO-OPERATION

The knowledge gained during the habit-forming period of the boys' lives in the thirteen years of successful operation of University School for Boys is used to direct rightly their energies, not suppress them. As a result well-grounded mental, physical and moral equipment for the work of the world is given in a way that secures the co-operation of the student and the approval of his parents.

INDIVIDUAL INSTRUCTION

Individual instruction is secured by limiting the number of students under each teacher to ten. In this way the tutorial system is carried to the highest point of efficiency, and the best development of each boy is insured. In this way every effort is made to have each boy find himself, and his inclination once discovered he is given every possible assistance in that direction. Each boy recites every lesson every day.

What the new student will see at Brenau!

By MARY CARTER WINTER

BRENAU TENNIS GIRL.
Photograph by Winn.

NEARLY every girl wants to go to college. To some a diploma signifies her fellowship with the elect of her day, and a college education is the open sesame to higher things. To others the prospect of college days suggests delightful visions of pleasant comradeship and of happy, wholesome fun, balanced by study and cultural progress.

To both the very earnest student and to her who wishes to acquire the graces of womanhood and a basic education, the question of choosing a college becomes a momentous one—a question of the deepest interest as well as of the keenest pleasure. Catalogues are scanned eagerly from cover to cover, and long discussions are the order of the day. Then, all of a sudden, the choice is made.

She who has chosen BRENAU COLLEGE, GAINESVILLE, GA., will find her every ideal of college life fulfilled.

Brenau is an institution in which educational excellence and esthetic charm are wonderfully combined. It is thorough, progressive, and highly satisfactory from every standpoint.

THIRTY-TWO BUILDINGS.

It has thirty-two beautiful, sanitary buildings, completely equipped for the varying purposes for which each was designed, and each is related to the other by harmony of line and color, the whole effect being instantly pleasing to the eye.

Within the decorations and furnishings are such as one would find in a handsome residence, Brenau priding itself upon the elegance of its furnishings and the pleasant home atmosphere with which it surrounds its girls.

The class rooms are light and pleasantly located. The dormitories are designed for comfort and attractiveness as well as utility, and a private bath is provided for each two suites of rooms.

A COLLEGE ESTATE OF 100 ACRES.

The college estate comprises one hundred acres of land, part of which is maintained as a natural park. The campus grounds, shaded with stately old oaks, the beautiful gardens, the useful farm, all have their place in the large domain. In the park is Lake Lanier, on the banks of which is the pretty little country club; and at the head of the lake is the memorial fountain to Sidney Lanier, the South's great poet. These and other places of interest and beauty arouse not only an esthetic appreciation in the girls, but create, as well, a pride in the loveliness of their college.

Just as no pains are spared to make the exterior of the college pleasing in order that the girls may benefit by beautiful environments, so no effort is withheld that would add to the educational excellence of the college.

The result has been that Brenau has moved into the front rank of Southern educational institutions. The actuating motive behind the phenomenal growth of Brenau has been to make it the great non-sectarian and independent college for women in the South. This high aim accounts, in part, for Brenau's remarkable development—a development so gradual and so logical that its ideals and customs have been modified as progress demanded, without any startling changes.

The present organization of Brenau is founded upon experience, admittedly the best teacher; and it is prepared to render the highest grade of educational services to its pupils and the South

BRENAU'S CLAIMS.

Brenau makes its appeal purely on the ground of merit.

It is undenominational and has no political affiliations, although all churches are represented in its student body, and each denomination has a house of worship in the town.

Brenau is located among the foothills of the Blue Ridge Mountains, but is conveniently near to Atlanta, the largest business center of a wide, rich area. This proximity enables the students of the college to hear grand opera each year and to benefit by other artistic and educational events in the city.

The climate of Gainesville is crisp and invigorating, and so healthful that the girls at Brenau are seldom even slightly ill.

Brenau presents three-fold advantages. It is a "Class A" college combined with a famous Conservatory and a School of Oratory, whose graduates are entitled to enter the senior class of the Emerson School of Oratory at Boston without examination.

There is no other school in the South which offers such social opportunities, nor any which devotes itself so completely to the training of young girls into splendid womanhood.

Brenau gives attention to the intellectual, moral, spiritual and physical phases of the girl's nature, nor does the college overlook the need of training her practically for the duties of life.

The Domestic Science Department was specially established for the education of the home makers and the housekeepers of the future, and to the girl who enters Brenau is given a high ideal in "the everyday simple things of life, which are yet so vital."

Business courses are offered for the benefit of those who wish a commercial education, and a special course has been designed for those who wish to become teachers.

Brenau has already 25 per cent more reservations this year than it had last year, at this time, and applications for rooms should be made at once.

Write for an illustrated catalogue and read something more about the distinctive features and splendid equipment of Brenau.

Regular sessions open September 11.

The Great Public Thirst for Present Day Education

By ROBERT J. LOWRY.

NOTWITHSTANDING the fact that this has been styled an age of materialism and commercialism, the close observer of the tendency of twentieth century times can but see that the public seeks information on every subject and nothing is worth while which is not educational. The public wants information, reliable and trustworthy; and while they want it in brief and concise form they want it. This is true of people young and old, and there seems to be no period in the average life when the mind ceases to be inquiring and becomes self-sufficient and retrospective.

Notwithstanding the fact that one generation knows that it must pass from the scene of action and give way to another, it seems that the desire for enlightened information and instruction increases with advancing age, and that desire is evidently prompted by a realization of the fact that each generation should perfect itself as far as possible and leave to posterity the best of their attainment and impress their individuality upon coming society and future civilization.

Clamors for Information.

The public clamors for expert information. If a fact is accepted as a fact it must be borne out by experience and experiment, and every trade and profession holding out to the public evidences of enlightened progress in their several lines must be able to convince the public that this progress is the result of expert research. Then the public accepts the information, quickly assimilates it and awaits further educational developments. It seems to be a foregone conclusion that the public not only awaits progressive information, but that they are entitled to have it, and the exponents of the sciences, professions and trades feel bound to the public to study and experiment and expound every phenomenon with which we come in contact.

The public expects of the journalist, the pedagogue, the divine, the astronomer, the chemist, the scientist, the doctor, the dentist, the pharmacist and the authors of text books on all subjects that they will spin out their webs of knowledge and exercise their faculties in intelligent study and research and give the public the concise result of their efforts, that the information may be disseminated, not only for the present, but the future as well.

In view of this popular demand for education, it is a gratifying fact to see our great country dotted with school houses, colleges, churches, public libraries, industrial training schools, military encampments and governmental demonstration plants in all branches of endeavor. Hundreds of thousands of dollars are freely given annually to such institutions of training as will develop the mind and morals, and in all sincerity I boldly state that, notwithstanding many pessimists say that this is an age of grasping commercialism, we have today some of the grandest examples of public altruism that the world has ever seen. These gifts are to be doubly commended because they meet the present popular demand for expert information along all lines of research and study, but they necessarily do succeeding generations good, and uplift the race by elevating the educational, moral and ethical standards of the young.

The Public Is Aroused.

The public is aroused more than ever before to its great responsibility. We realize more than ever before that the voice of conservation must be heard. We are realizing more than ever before that it is a shameful and sinful deprivation of God-given privilege to allow a child to grow up without education, whether by neglect or by intent. We seem to realize that future civilization is to a great extent within the sacred keeping of the present generation; that the future progress of the race will be measured by whatever each individual, awake to the responsibility of this charge, does to promote it. For the great good that is being done to-day along the lines of public education and training our hearts should be so full of joy as to act as an encouraging incentive to the most slothful and as a stimulant to the progressive and benevolent patriot.

The public thirsts for not only the material in education, but the aesthetic as well. We grasp with avidity anything that tends to uplift the race. Good books, inspiring poems, clean stories, well-written plays, impressive motion pictures, sweet music, fresh air, clean sport and beautiful flowers are within the reach of everybody. All these are helps in beautifying life and character. They help to form taste and establish character upon a firm, moral foundation. The public thirsts for knowledge, it is true, but the public also recognizes that knowledge does not comprise all that is contained in the large term of education. The feelings are to be disciplined; the passions are to be restrained; true and worthy motives are to be inspired, and pure morality inculcated, along with the substantial material information and knowledge. Good books and contact with good people add largely to the means of acquiring this desired end.

We are living in an age that means new aims, new pursuits and new methods, and it behooves every human being to cultivate himself or herself to stay abreast of and in full sympathy with the growth and progress of the times, and to not only be well posted along all lines of educational endeavor, but to assimilate and apply the broad spirit of altruism and toleration, which seems to be the trend of modern thought and practice.

COL. ROBERT J. LOWRY.

Advancement in the World.

The hide-bound sectarian, the dreamer, the worshipper of tradition, the slave of precedent, the retrospect and the proud has-been play but little part in the world's advancement and progress of to-day. Traffic, contact and amalgamation are doing their great work of cementing the peoples of the earth in broad cosmopolitan friendship and toleration, and civilization marches onward by a process of elimination of the worst and perfection of the best there is in each generation, and the great law of the survival of the fittest, though apparently relentless and cruel, is a necessary law to progress.

The spirit of the times is to acquire substantial and expert information, to forget the mistakes of the past and to bend every effort to eliminate mistakes in the future. All this spirit of the times is but an outgrowth of the public thirst for education; it is but an outgrowth of the popular demand that those who profess proficiency in their several lines of endeavor must give the public their best effort, not as a favor condescendingly given the public, but as a fulfillment of obligation to the public, to the times and to their own and future generations.

I know of no nation, outside of America, that is making the educational strides that Japan is making. Elementary education is now fairly diffused among all classes of Japanese, and it is so rare a thing to find even in the lowest class a man or a woman who can not read and write, that I have no doubt the proportion of illiteracy is higher in Boston or Chicago than it is in Tokio. Why? Because the statesmen of Japan are fulfilling their self-imposed task of educating the nation, and certainly it is an astonishing example of enlightenment and perseverance.

Education Exemplified.

I am not one of those unfortunates who deplores the growth of commercialism. It's the making of our nation. We carry the aesthetic into our commerce. It is education exemplified. The spirit of commercialism, guided by educational training, is what gives you your beautiful homes, your palatial churches, your comfortable traveling conveniences, your beautiful parks, driveways, lakes and streams, your magnificent monuments and all the adornments of this beautiful land.

The landscape artist lays out a beautiful park from motives of commercialism, but he has educated himself in the line of beautifying nature, and his services are in demand commercially. Education idealizes the material, but at the same time it materializes the ideal, and both are kept in harmony for the benefit of mankind, if there exists the properly educated mental tone, which prevents idealism from running wild and materialism from trampling the aesthetic side.

In view of the spirit of the times, it behooves every man, woman and child to apply brain and brawn in the everlasting present, that our works may make clear the way for future generations. As long as we have that insatiate thirst for educational enlightenment it is proof conclusive that we have not reached the summit of human achievement; there is always room for improvement.

We should take advantage of every opportunity to serve the progress of men, speak to the present of the bright and radiant light of the future, and in all of our relations rise above local or selfish prejudice to advocate the higher claims of altruistic patriotism and the future welfare of humanity.

The Modern Conservatory A Practical Conservatory

By WILLIAM S. COX

President of Cox College-Conservatory, College Park, Ga.

WELL-NIGH universal is the idea that music is merely a means of entertainment—something to please the senses. As a beautiful art, no doubt it has its effect on the emotions. Therein lies its power and hold on mankind—for there is no one but admires its rhythm; no class of people but yield to its sway. To music we dance, by music we bury the dead, by music an army is led to the fray, by music praise to Almighty God is wafted on high. "Music is the harmonious voice of Creation, an echo of the invisible world—one note of the divine concord which the entire universe is destined one day to sound."

Well has the poet expressed this thought—

"Music the fiercest grief can charm,
And Fate's severest rage disarm.
Music can soften pain to ease,
And make sadness and madness to please."

Being such a beautiful art and universally admired, it becomes also a practical art, and it is this feature we wish particularly to stress.

Of Prime Importance.

In the education of a student, the study of music is of prime importance. A knowledge of this subject gives pleasure in the home, valuable service in the church, insures choice associations throughout life and furnishes a pleasant means of livelihood.

One important feature of a conservatory is its location. Herein lies one of the main elements of success. Large cities are, without doubt, the natural homes of conservatories. What the eye is to the artist, the ear is to the musician. The value of hearing recitals by the world's best artists and musical organizations can not be overestimated. Not only for pleasure and inspiration, but for actual teaching value, attendance upon a concert is often worth months of study. Cities also furnish most favorable conditions for the musical atmosphere, which in European countries is deemed an important factor in a musical education.

Organization is a practical feature of the conservatory. The day is past when a musical education consisted in the study of one branch. To-day the musician must be conversant with a dozen. The conservatory furnishes instruction in all the branches of music and arranges courses with a view to proper relation and co-ordination. The broadening effect thereof is most salutary. Nor must there be neglected the magnetism of numbers, the incentive to excel, the wholesome spirit of rivalry engendered by association with others in the same work.

WILLIAM S. COX.

Material Equipment.

Material equipment is very important. Many institutions may provide good instruments, but few keep them in tune. The injury done annually to the musical ear of thousands of students can not be calculated. Important is the function of the library where musical history, biography, science and fiction may be read. Musical magazines and periodicals keep the student in touch with musical life all over the country and furnish their quota of inspiration. A concert hall is indispensable for best results. Orchestral and chorus work are most effective in large concert halls. The students' recital has come to stay and is one of the most valuable allies of the modern teacher. Faculty recitals and those from visiting artists are here held for the edification of the students.

After all, the most important part of a conservatory is its faculty. The spirit of modern times demands skilled labor in the educational as well as in other professional fields. A teacher of music must not only be master of his art, but also master of the art of teaching it.

Given a suitable location, adequate equipment, efficient organization, capable faculty—what is the result?

The profession gains men and women well equipped for a lifework of beauty and usefulness, powerful factors in the social, moral, religious, artistic and practical world.

The Latest Out.

It is possible that marine engineering may be revolutionized as the result of a launch to be made at Middlesbrough, England. The vessel concerned is the Tynemount, and it will be the first sea-going ship in the world to be electrically propelled. The electricity is generated by two oil engines. As the vessel is of 2,400 tons burden, it is large enough to insure that its trial trips will have a really practical value.

She Used To.

Mrs. Tremendous Blank advertised for a maid and got a lot of answers. From the crowd of applicants she chose one. And ere long there was trouble in the family. The maid had been employed elsewhere, and she knew the difference.

One day the lady became acrimonious: "Do you call yourself a lady's maid?"

"I used to, ma'am," replied the servant, "before I worked for you."

The Difference.

"Don't you know the difference," said the counsel, "between a horse and a donkey?"

"Well, sir," replied the witness, "I should never take you for a horse."

Guard Against Future.

A clever convict, who wanted more than the regular prison fare, once made a complaint in rather ingenious terms. An inspector entered the man's cell and found it very hot and stuffy.

"Why have you got your ventilator closed?" he asked.

The prisoner answered plaintively: "Well, inspector, the last time I had the ventilator open a wasp flew in, you see, and carried off my dinner while my back was turned."

Hen Read the Sign.

The Johnsons, according to a recent story, had an old hen which insisted upon neglecting her comfortable nest to lay a daily egg in the coal cellar.

"I can't think," fretted Mrs. Johnson, as she and her small son Joe together hunted for that particular egg, "why this one hen insists upon using the coal bin."

"Why, that's easy, mother," exclaimed Joe, in astonishment. "I s'pose she's seen the sign, 'Now is the time to lay in your coal.'"

Life Insurance: Its History and Benefits

By H. M. WILLET.

THE purpose underlying the business of life insurance is as old as the human race. Its basis is the natural instinct of man to establish a home, to protect his wife and children and to labor for their interests. This instinct has occasioned every social revolution, every industrial advance and the whole progress of civilization since the creation of the world.

The early history of life insurance is simple and interesting.

The family was the first group formed by society. When the family was no longer able to defend itself, and the Government too weak to furnish adequate protection, various larger groups were formed, such as tribes, military organizations, guilds, etc. Among them was the Roman Collegia, somewhat on the order of a fraternal organization, which charged certain fees, and paid to the families of the deceased members amounts within the discretion of the officers.

Associations of Friends.

These early societies were usually associations of close friends who conducted the insurance features without much system. In the course of time unscrupulous promoters appeared on the scene, and gambling insurance began its checkered career.

Charles Dickens graphically described these wildcat schemes, which were nothing more than lotteries, and laws were passed to prohibit the issuance of policies except where proper insurable interest was shown.

The modern science of life insurance had its real beginning in the seventeenth century, when Jan DeWitt, a Dutch mathematician, conceived the idea of applying the doctrine of probabilities to the valuation of human life.

In 1693 Edmund Halley, an English astronomer, elaborated a system of mortality tables, and deductions therefrom as to life values, which gave quite a stimulus to the business. To Elizur Wright, the American actuary, is generally given credit for having laid the foundation of life insurance in this country, and for developing a scientific system of surrender values and other features of protection.

Americans Appreciative.

Just 70 years ago the first permanent American company was organized, and since then the task of perfecting mortality tables and working out the many details of the business has made steady progress.

The American people are showing more and more their appreciation of the benefits of life insurance by constantly increasing the number and amounts of the policies they carry.

H. M. WILLET.

The new business written and paid for in 1907 amounted to $1,939,000,000, as against $3,232,871,138 in 1912. At the close of 1907 the ordinary and industrial life insurance in force in the United States was $14,080,000,000, while at the end of 1912 the amount had grown to nearly $20,000,000,000.

These immense sums, however, represent but a fraction of the insurable value of the lives of our people, and there is still a wide field for the further development of the business.

Capital of the People.

On January 1, 1913, the total admitted assets of the legal reserve life insurance companies in the United States were $4,404,744,039. This vast amount belongs to the 20,000,000 policyholders scattered throughout the country, and illustrates the fact that it is the savings and capital of the people that control the great enterprises of this republic.

In speaking of these immense assets of the insurance companies, ex-President Taft has recently said:

"This enormous sum, accumulated from every part of the country and from all classes of citizens, is not only a bulwark against future want and poverty, but it is an ever-increasing source of prosperity in the present. As it must be invested in order to carry out its purpose, it builds our railroads and our factories, finances our industrial and commercial enterprises and distributes its potent streams in every direction, as irrigation spreads fertility in an arid land. It is one of the greatest modern instances of the power of a great people acting together for good."

Custer's Last Fight

IT was thirty-seven years ago that Custer and his men were annihilated at the Battle of the Little Big Horn.

In June, 1866, a conference was held at Fort Laramie for the purpose of getting the Indian chiefs to cede a wagon route to Montana. The route was refused, and upon the Americans expressing their determination to establish the road the Indians at once began war. Fetterman's command of 81 officers and men were massacred, and thus began the hostilities which lasted for twelve years.

In 1876 the red men refused to go upon the reservation assigned them by treaty, and a force of regular troops was sent against them. Custer led the advance with the Seventh Cavalry, some 700 strong. On June 25 his scouts discovered the Sioux encampment, and Custer, with his accustomed impetuosity, determined to attack them at once. Without waiting for the support of General Terry, who was moving up the Big Horn to attack the red men from the rear, Custer detached Colonel Reno with the larger part of his force to assail the rear of the encampment, while he, with some 275 men, dashed straight for the Indian center. It was like rushing into the "Mouth of Hell." The Indians, outnumbering him ten to one, closed about him in a constantly narrowing circle, and the result was just what might have been expected. Custer, his two brothers, his nephew and every one of his men were killed. Encircled by the ring of fire, the Americans fought as Americans always fight when the occasion calls for it, and many a redskin bit the dust. It was the Alamo over again—American valor and courage maintaining themselves to the last ditch and the last man against overwhelming odds.

It was unnecessary, that massacre of the Little Big Horn; the situation that made it possible was the result of rashness and foolish haste; but all the same we honor Custer and his men for the unconquerable bravery which made the name of the Little Big Horn immortal in our country's annals.

An Open Letter to Boys

By WILLIAM W. DICK.

MY DEAR BOY: You are now well within your teens, and the question of your schooling has become a matter of very great importance. Let me advise you—from an experience of many years—on those things touching your life, with which your school must have much to do.

To begin with, do not think that the mere acquirement of book knowledge is alone involved. Modern equipment and advantageous surroundings are an absolute necessity for the full development of the well-rounded twentieth century schoolboy, and such a theory is as disastrous as that other extreme which apparently assumes that brick and mortar arranged in academic style will constitute a school. It is the wise combination of these, together with other principles, which is necessary to the making of a great institution.

Secondly, my boy, avoid any school lacking stability and possessed of no well-established policy. Radical and frequent change of management can but presage ultimate disaster for any school, and the cost to you is too great. One of the chief values which your institution should offer is the inestimable advantage, lasting through life, of being an alumnus of a distinguished school. This is practically nullified should your prep school afterward discontinue its work—for live interest can not be maintained in dead issues.

Choose Along Broad Lines.

Thirdly, count as negligible the school of local or restricted patronage. In this age when Truth is the great essential to be gained, narrowness of any kind is intolerable, and the young man proscribed in views or training is at a marked disadvantage. Your school should be national in patronage and as broad and cosmopolitan in its nature as is American manhood.

And now, my dear boy, to turn from these negatives to a more positive statement of what you should and can find in the better prep schools of your State.

Of course, my affiliation with the Georgia Military Academy at College Park strongly predisposes me in its favor as a choice, but all of the three or four better schools strongly emphasize the majority of the following features, and consequently merit investigation.

The ideal preparatory school must offer a chance for development along the following lines of mental, moral, social and physical growth:

1. At least three distinct courses of study, preparing you for work in the regular collegiate institution or in a technological school, or for entry into commercial life.

2. A faculty of strong, experienced and successful teachers, with at least one teacher to every twelve or fourteen boys.

3. A location where the culture of a great city is constantly operative.

4. Commodious buildings and beautiful grounds.

5. Modern baths, toilets, sewerage and lights.

6. Carefully directed and abundant table fare, supplied from best city markets and preferably a school farm.

7. Clean, manly athletics in which all students have an active part. Physical development should be the chief aim in this department as well as in both indoor and outdoor gymnasiums.

8. Delightful, salubrious climate permitting of much outdoor work and recreation throughout the year.

9. A strong military department of such high excellence as to prove an incentive to the very best in academic work.

10. An annual school encampment in which the entire time is devoted to such out-door work as will build strong bodies.

11. The ultimate in social and moral standards.

12. A nation-wide patronage of manly, representative boys.

I believe a school providing adequate growth along all of these lines is doing very nearly its full duty by the youth of the land.

Inspect Before Final Choice.

And as a last word, one that can hardly be too strongly put, let me urge you to ask your parent or guardian to go into this matter with you most carefully, and after you have succeeded in eliminating all but the three or four better schools, then by all means, if possible, together personally visit and study each of these in order to determine just which is the one in which you can do your largest and best service by yourself in the important preparation so necessary to full success in life.

Finally, I must express my keen appreciation of the great honor conferred on me by The Sunday American in asking that I address the schoolboys of the country. I deem it a sacred privilege, and trust, my dear boy, that you will ever regard me as your very sincere friend.

WASHINGTON SEMINARY—THE SCHOOL OF HIGH IDEALS

By EVELYN WREN

A ride into the prettiest residential section of Atlanta, a walk through a private park shaded by magnificent trees, and I arrived at a palatial Colonial home which shelters many girls just budding into young maidenhood. I could not but envy the twenty-five girls whose privilege it is to dwell at Washington Seminary and enjoy its influence for nine months of the year. Sincere, sweet women love it as their Alma Mater, the mother all-beneficent and helpful during the formative period of their lives.

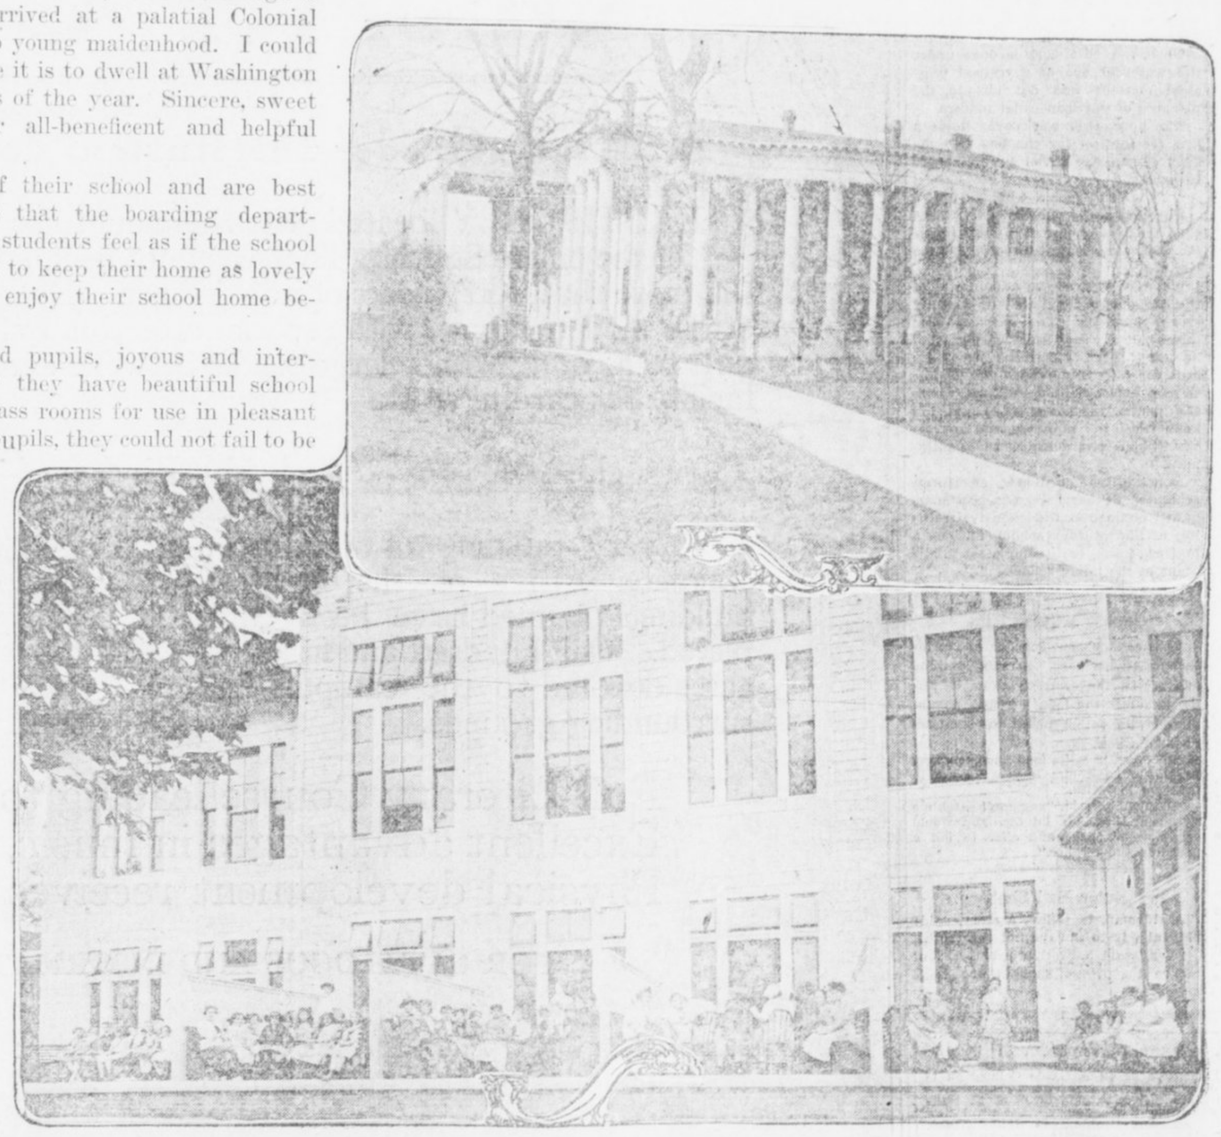
It is because girls need the maternal love of their school and are best trained and influenced through a home atmosphere that the boarding department of Washington Seminary is limited. The students feel as if the school were theirs; they "belong" and must do their best to keep their home as lovely in spirit as it is beautiful materially. The girls enjoy their school home because they absorb its loveliness.

The day school embraces nearly three hundred pupils, joyous and interested. They could hardly be less than joyous, for they have beautiful school rooms in a building built for them and out-door class rooms for use in pleasant weather. With one teacher over every fourteen pupils, they could not fail to be interested. The individuality of each child is brought out to the fullest and development is rapid.

During the school years a girl's mind is often developed at the cost of her physical strength. This is especially true where study is made attractive and interesting. To guard against this possibility physical training is a requirement at Washington Seminary. A foundation of good health is established and the studies seem more like play than ever.

The open-air class rooms make it possible for the students to spend two-thirds of their time out of doors, in sight of the pine grove over which the breezes waft fragrance. These rooms correspond to the sections within the school building and are shaded by awnings during the sunny part of the year. The health record proves that the theory of keeping children well has been practical. Juvenile diseases are limited to one or two pupils, for contagion seems impossible.

The music faculty is especially strong. Nine teachers have charge of piano, voice, violin, pipe organ and chorus instruction. In order that students musically inclined may have the opportunity to give music the necessary time, music counts toward graduation in place of literary work. This puts music into the important place that it should hold with those who intend to make it a specialty.



Just a peep into a class-room and a surprise awaited me. There was a large range and twenty-five small gas stoves. Every utensil needed for the praparation of food was orderly placed in the cabinets beneath the stove. It made me long to light the gas and begin to make a favorite dish. That is the way the girls feel, too, and domestic science period is a favorite one. Nevertheless it is a requirement, for it is advisable that girls have practical and theoretical training in the arts of home-making and home-keeping. The course is complete and comprehensive and the proof of this is evidenced at the luncheons the girls serve with no assistance.

Girls grow sweet and wholesome at Washington Seminary. They learn the inner meaning of life and its application. The environment prepares for splendid womanhood. Amid the trees, the home atmosphere and the supervision of competent teachers the budding girlhood unfolds to glorious maturity.

The Washington Seminary girls never fail to tell of the delightful days spent in their school. The day students know only one regret—they have to leave their school each afternoon. Each day brings new pleasure, for their school life is ideal.

If I were not long past school age, I would beg to go to Washington Seminary. My long-drawn sigh as I regretfully said good-bye to the large, impressive buildings was the only indication I dared give. I could not be a baby before Dr. Scott, so I did not care to risk tears.

If you would understand my enthusiasm, write for the catalogue of Washington Seminary, 1374 Peachtree Road, Atlanta. It will give you an idea of the beauty of the school and its distinctive features.

Training for Life Work in Our Rural Schools

By CHAS. C. THACH, LL.D.
President Alabama Polytechnic Institute.

FROM the beginning the aim of education has been to prepare a man for his vocation. The particular vocation of supreme significance may have varied with the age, yet the aim of the system of schools has ever been the fitting of men for the dominant calling of the day, be it what it may. Schoolman, clergyman, lawyer, orator, soldier—has not each of the whole catalogue of the so-called learned professions dictated, in turn, the type of education? And now within the last half century has arrived the artisan, the doer of things as well as the thinker of thoughts—the farmer, the mechanic—demanding training for his own special life work. And to-day the most significant factor in our educational life is perhaps that education known as industrial.

General Education.

In discussing the question of education in the rural schools, I should insist that the first imperative need is a thorough general education. Behind the trade and the profession is the man. Every farmer is a citizen and he has both a soul and a country to save. The rural school must give the pupil an intelligent understanding for the honorable discharge of the various duties of life. A degree and range of information and intelligence are demanded by the exigencies and problems of agriculture which are hardly equal in any other occupation.

And in this development of the American farmer, the little red schoolhouse of the olden day, with its old-fashioned course of study, wrought a mighty work. It brought marvelous prosperity and growth to the United States. Its widspread influences permeated American society. It made our nation the wealthiest and most productive of all the nations of the world. It brought thrift, mental alertness and elasticity, prosperity and culture to our people, and made Yankee ingenuity and resourcefulness a proverb throughout the world. It has been the melting pot for the complete blending of our polyglot elements. It has been and will ever be the great antiseptic against national stagnation and decay. English thinkers like Mr. William Mather assigned the greatest influence on American manufactories to the general education of the American boy derived from their common schools. The fundamentals of a common school education can never lose their value for training the human mind.

But times have changed, and the day for general education alone has passed, just as in manufacturing processes the day for the methods of "mere common sense" has given way to the methods of expert skill and science. "The ten thousand little red schoolhouses at the country crossroads and their successors," says Professor Bailey, of Cornell, "have never taught the business of farming." But we know to-day that the business of farming can be taught in the schools. We know that culture and utility can be united, and the joining of these two hemispheres of life is the educational problem of the day.

the town. The fundamental duties of the common school will be to enable the child to sleep in his own bed and eat at his own breakfast table until

There is no occupation in the world to-day that calls for more ability and judgment, brains, training, industry and adaptability than farming. It is a man's job. To plow and sow and reap without understanding is no more real farming than cutting a man's leg off with an ax is real surgery.

No longer is the book farmer sneered at, but rather is the trained expert, the accepted guide and teacher of the farming class. Agriculture to-day is a science, the revelation having been brought about by the agricultural college and experiment station established some 50 years ago. By their painstaking observation of facts and careful and accurate interpretation of the laws of nature on an enormous scale there has become available an immense body of precise information concerning the principles that govern soil fertility, plant life and animal life, the three cardinal elements in the business of farming. Moreover, this body of knowledge has been gradually reduced to pedagogical form until to-day there exists quite an adequate amount of agricultural text and literature for use in our common schools.

Granting the need and desirability of introducing industrial education in our common schools, many practical questions suggest themselves. First, shall we have separate vocational schools, or shall agriculture and mechanic and domestic science be introduced as elements in the courses of the entire common school system? Forcible arguments are presented on either side. My own State of Alabama was the first State in the Union to establish a system of Congressional agricultural schools, there being at present nine such institutions in the State. They have already done excellent work and are rapidly becoming the type of industrial school for which they were originally intended. However, recognizing as I do the value of the separate agricultural school, the weight of argument in the matter as a whole seems to lie entirely in favor of the combined or cosmopolitan school. The accessibility of the vocational school to children right at their own doors is a highly important matter. "What does it mean for the future of the country," it has been asked, "when boys and girls who advance beyond the grammar grades have to go into town to get their high school education? At the most impressionable age they are trained in the habits of the age of 18 and yet receive an adequate education. This means that the school should teach both industrial subjects, as well as those subjects that interpret to the children the beauty and the inspiration of God's great outdoors."

Course of Study.

The subject-matter for a practical definite course of industrial training lies immediately at hand. The principles of agriculture, horticulture, floriculture, carpentry, basket making, all forms of nature study, habits of birds and plants and fish, why plants grow, how plants grow—all these can be taught, all being of infinite interest and of direct practical value.

And to accomplish the greatest good with these subjects they should be introduced into the upper elementary and the grammar grades, for, as we know, only a minute fraction of the children remain in school beyond the eighth grade.

The college of agriculture, the experiment station, bulletins, farmers' institutes, are all valuable—indeed, absolutely indispensable—but the real work of regenerating our agriculture and our mechanical trades must begin with our children.

And there seems to me ample time for the introduction of these new subjects in our courses of study. As things stand, we have erected a stupendous educational scaffolding for our children. In my opinion, and I am ready to defend the thesis, the preparation for the work as it is given to-day in our elementary and secondary schools and colleges and professional schools, could with profit be reduced a third of the time.

Let us have less of cube root, less of certain forms of geography, less of superficial physiology, less of story telling and idling of time, less of stocks and bonds and bank discount, etc., and we can readily find place for studies that will put more cream in the churn and more beans in the bin; that will inculcate a genuine love and appreciation of the rich delights of the farm and countryside; that will create a spirit of devotion to country life rather than alienation, thus serving to check the cityward exodus of our country boys.

Practical Work.

And the problem of practical work for school agriculture is rapidly finding solution. The school garden, the village plat system, the large farm system of the Christian Brothers at Lincolndale, New York, and the Jewish National Farm School near Philadelphia, the agricultural high school system of experiment stations and farms are all successful efforts in the right direction, but the supreme movement for practical work for all schools and especially for the rural schools, is the organization of boys' corn clubs, boys' pig clubs and girls' canning clubs. The success of this movement has been marvelous. It permeates the remotest regions and has met signal success in the very smallest schools. The laboratory is a boy's own home, the boy's own farm; the girl's own home and the girl's own tomato patch. It is organized rural life on the spot. It is the thing itself. It shows the boy and girl that farm life pays. It enlists their interest and throws the center of gravity to the country rather than to the city. It is the great antidote against the call of the crowd and the lure of the limelight. In one Southern State, for instance, there are 11,000 boys thus organized and over 3,000 girls, the average yield of corn having been raised in this industrial army of the young from 18 to 46 bushels per acre; over 100 of them averaging over 100 bushels to the acre. The gospel is good seed, good fertilization, good cultivation; and the fruits of this gospel—good crops, prosperity and happiness and content on the farm. The slogan of this movement is not so much, "back to the farm," as "stay on the farm."

Manual Training.

Another highly important factor of practical work that should be undertaken by rural schools is manual training.

Truly, one of the most imperative needs of the South to-day is a mechanical sense—the ability to utilize machinery and labor-saving devices.

How many farmers in any community are able to apply to their own business the beneficial results of improved farm machinery, or recent discoveries in practice of farm life? And what shall be said of the lack of mechanical conveniences about the home or in the kitchen?

On every hand there is a most urgent demand for skilled labor, the supply being entirely inadequate. Yet only the most meager facilities are available for white youths in the South for learning these excellent arts and crafts of the hand that really make up the higher material expressions of a people's civilization.

We advocate this training for the negro. We advocate it for the incorrigible white; but, I ask, do we desire that the door to all this fine form of mechanical labor shall be forever closed to the great masses of our intelligent and worthy youths?

With the development into electrical energy of the water power along the foothills of the piedmont escarpment, the South seems to offer a wonderful field for the application of mechanical, industrial skill. Shall we leave for others to enter in and take possession of this legacy, or shall we train our own sons for these great possibilities?

Why may not the day come when we shall see the work of the home and farm yard done by electric motors—chopping the food supply for the cattle, pumping the water, driving the sewing machine, swinging the churn and rocking the cradle—thus supplanting the hand that rules the world.

Wood work or carpentry will be the form of manual training most readily developed for the boys, the equipment being inexpensive and readily supplied. The chief obstacle to the immediate progress of this movement of indsutrial education, as we know, is the lack of properly trained, competent instructors; but the obstacle is not insurmountable. The agricultural colleges, normal schools and agricultural high schools are already remedying the defects and the widespread demand and handsome salaries offered for vocational teachers will inevitably bring supply.

A prosperous, intelligent and contented rural population—this is a thing desired.

Mercer University

THE UNIVERSITY consists of three distinct departments, the COLLEGE OF LIBERAL ARTS, THE LAW SCHOOL, and the SCHOOL OF PHARMACY.

The COLLEGE OF LIBERAL ARTS offers to young men classical and scientific courses not inferior to any in the South.

The LAW SCHOOL is conducted by active judges and lawyers of national reputation, and the graduates give evidence of their superior training.

The SCHOOL OF PHARMACY affords a thorough and practical course, with the advantages of economical board, literary societies, libraries, laboratory equipment, etc., enjoyed by all collegiate students.

Graduates from Mercer rank with the foremost men of affairs in Georgia and the South. In public life no institution in the State has had a greater share in the number and quality of her distinguished citizens. Of the Governors of the State since the Civil War, four of them were Mercer Alumni, probably more than graduated from any other college.

The recent successful campaign for $300,000, together with the Lawson and Dodd bequests during the past year, increases the present endowment to more than $600,000.

The University ranks with the best colleges in the South in scholarship, moral influence and athletics. Mercer not only emphasizes the religious factors—not sectarian, but has no superior in scholarship and modern intercollegiate athletics. Mercer University is a member of both the Southern Association of Schools and Colleges and the Southern Intercollegiate Athletic Association, which insures scholarship and clean athletics.

Mercer solicits prospective collegiate, law and pharmacy students.

The Ideal School

By PROF. GUY A. MOORE.
Principal University School for Boys, Stone Mountain, Ga.

A CHERISHED ideal of every father and every mother for their boy is that he may attain nearly physical perfection; that his mental powers may receive their fullest development and that morally and spiritually his character may be fashioned free from flaws. This is the school training planned by every true educator. This is the school training that produces the highest type of American manhood, the training that produces the man who measures four squares.

This commonly desired end is to-day sought by two methods, one of coercion and restraint, the other of persuasive guidance and sympathetic leadership. These methods are as old as the history of education. It is still a question in the minds of parents which idea shall prevail in the education of their boys.

The Home School.

The fundamental principle of the non-military home school is that of sympathetic guidance. The development of the boy's faculties is sought in an appeal to his better nature, but not through fear or force. In the home school where only a limited number of boys is taken, the peculiar temperament and ability of every boy can be studied and understood. The value of individual training can not be overestimated.

The paramount idea in education is the development of personality. Just as boys differ in physique, just so they differ in heart and mind. Just so surely as the physical exercises for one boy are not suited to another, just so surely particular methods must be followed in his mental and moral training. Herein lies the peculiar value of the limited home school.

Sympathetic teachers study the temperament of every boy and gently turn him from cheap commonplace thinking and lead him to live in the realm of fine ideals and noble aspirations.

The idea that character was ever developed by command of superiors has been discarded. The great men who have risen from such training have been great in spite of it—not because of it.

Napoleon's famous saying that obedience must precede commanding loses value when measured by the Duke of Wellington's immortal words, "The battle of Waterloo was won when I was a schoolboy on the playgrounds at Eton."

The Napoleonic idea of men has lost favor.

The man of to-day is to be an individual force, not a unit of a mass dominated by one despotic mind.

PROF. GUY A. MOORE.

Two European Extremes.

The schools of England and those of Prussia form a striking contrast. The former, non-military schools, have for decades given to the world the highest types of the gentlemen. Rugby, Eton, Harrell, Winchester, etc., where the burning purpose is the development of men, are strikingly set against the Government school of Germany where the boy is fashioned first a soldier and then a man.

Gymnasium vs. Drill Field.

The gymnasium is universally recognized as superior to all other forces for physical training. The gymnasiums in the Y. M. C. A. buildings in hundreds of American cities bear testimony to their popularity. Here the boy is given work, proportionate to his strength and not required to go through monotonous movements day after day that fosters a dislike for exercise.

The many beautiful formations in gymnasium work appeal to a young fellow's imagination and he looks forward to this hour of the day with keenest anticipation.

Then, too, this work is done under the watchful eye of a trained physical director and not left to the pleasure of partisan cadet officers.

The apparatus work ever holds a fine fascination for the boy and his best efforts are given in his desire to excel.

The Home Life.

Furthermore, the various games that make a gymnasium hall indispensable appeal most forcefully to the boy.

Not the least of the advantages of the home school is the air of gentility and refinement. The barracks and mess hall are necessary adjuncts of an army post, but more necessary still for our young boys are conditions, wholesome and sanitary, where the gentle influences of home life keep fresh the manners and courtesies which characterize the gentleman.

Punctuality, obedience, neatness, erectness of carriage, etc., so arrogantly claimed as the exclusive training of the military school, find, as a matter of fact, their completest fulfillment in the home school.

Couldn't Catch Him.

A farmer took out a policy of fire insurance on his barn. After a loss and due proofs, the company came to settle or adjust the loss, but took advantage of its option under the contract to build a new barn.

Subsequently a life insurance company sought to have him insure his life in favor of his wife.

"Oh, no," he said, "you don't catch me a second time. If I'd die, you would come around here and offer to get a new husband for her."

But a Bad Shot.

A rifleman, in telling a story, said: "My aim is to always tell the truth."

"Yes," said a brother private; "but you're the worst shot in the regiment."

The Feminine Soul

By H. J. PEARCE
President Brenau College Conservatory.

IT is said that in the other world there is no marrying and giving in marriage, and this fact might furnish some foundation for a belief that whatever difference may exist in the physical natures of male and female, that such or similar differences do not exist in their spiritual natures.

It would be vain to appeal to psychology for any light on this interesting subject, for the modern psychologist distinctly refuses to express any scientific opinion concerning the soul. In view of the fact that psychology had its origin in an attempt to study the soul, and that etymologically the term means "the science of the soul," it is strange that modern psychology, as has been frequently remarked, is "a psychology without a soul."

This does not imply, by any means, that the modern psychologist does not believe in the existence of the soul. His views on that subject are as diverse and varying as the views of the physiologist, the chemist, or of any other scientist. It simply means that the modern psychologist, as such, has abandoned the attempt to study the soul scientifically, just as the modern chemist and physicist, as such, has abandoned any attempt to study scientifically the ultimate nature of matter. And as the natural scientist concerns himself with the discovery and the orderly relation and classification of the phenomena of matter, so the psychologist, as such, is concerned purely with the discovery and the orderly relation and classification of the phenomena—not of the soul, but of the mind.

The Practical Side.

The discussion of the soul, therefore, as of the ultimate nature of matter is relegated to the domain of metaphysics—a subject which is comparatively little considered in these latter days when science dominates the world and men demand of every idea "what is its use."

But it is just because this question has a practical bearing that the writer ventures to raise it.

Is there such an entity as a feminine soul? If so, is it to the interest of the race to cultivate, preserve and perfect it? If on the other hand the feminine and the masculine soul natures are identical, is it to the interest of the race to search out the noblest manifestations of each and by proper means, in the process of the ages, bring to pass the evolution of a being which will have only the noblest qualities of each?

To get anywhere in a discussion, and not the less so if it be a metaphysical discussion, some postulates must be assumed.

In this instance it is assumed that the soul represents the ultimate being of the individual. Second, it is assumed that mental phenomena and physiological phenomena alike are manifestations of this ultimate being.

What Is the Explanation?

The argument for feminine and masculine souls then is founded upon the foregoing postulates. Is it conceivable that differences such as can be shown to exist in the feminine and masculine physical and mental phenomena can be explained in any way except upon the basis of a difference in the ultimate being of each?

The differences which are most potent between the feminine and masculine are probably the least important in this discussion. It is often true that very common phenomena are not essentially related to the nature of the source of the phenomena. For instance, water as we commonly know it has a certain average temperature a little colder as a rule than one's bodily temperature. So are most liquids. But this is not an essential characteristic of water. We can conceive of a world in which the temperature of all water may be at or near the boiling point, or vice versa, with equal readiness we can conceive a world in which all water is at or near the freezing point. Numerous illustrations of similarly important phenomena which are not essentially related to the apparent source of the phenomena might be pointed out.

Similarly, as before stated, it is probably true that the phenomena of sex, as physically expressed, do not constitute the essential differences between the ultimate masculine and feminine natures. These phenomena pertain to time and sense, and we can not conceive of them as elements in ultimate femininity. The Scriptural teaching concerning the alteration of the relations between male and female in the perfected state is entirely in accord with this view.

Not Only Phenomena.

But these phenomena are by no means the only phenomena—mental and physical—which differentiate the female from the male, and which imply a basal difference in their ultimate being.

It must be confessed that these differences are not always easily distinguishable. The education of women for generations has been fashioned as nearly as possible after the method of education of men. The two natures have been cast, as it were, into the same mold, and it is even surprising that there still remain perceptible differences.

It is possible in this brief article to notice only a few of these differences. The physical phenomenon which most clearly reveals the feminine soul is beauty. There are only a very few fundamental conceptions possible to the human mind, and beauty is one of them. The beautiful is eternal and absolute. Beauty manifests itself in varied forms, and its manifestations are not always perfect, as some homely women will attest. But who ever saw a woman so homely that no flash of beauty ever illumined her countenance? Even the homeliest woman is but an image of beauty marred in the making or using.

Woman's Prerogative.

The mental phenomenon which most clearly reveals the feminine soul is truth. If there is a such a thing as arriving at a truth by intuition, it is woman's prerogative to do so. Her mind turns to the truth as the needle to the pole. The comprehension of truth to the feminine soul may be said to be native; to the masculine soul it is acquired.

Observation of the physical woman and a careful study of her mental characteristics will convince any one that the "eternal feminine" is a reality. Its existence has been too little recognized in our modern educational systems.

Co-education in our universities is a mistake; colleges for women made according to the models of the colleges for men are a waste of money and an educational blunder; co-education in the high schools and in the elementary schools is little less than an educational crime.

We have regarded the Chinese as heathen because they bind the feet of their girls so that the woman may wear the shoe of a child. But we subject the minds of our girls to a greater deformity when we force them into the molds, as it were, which have been cast for the opposite sex.

Desire for Equal Rights.

The danger, if there be a danger, in the modern femininist movement for equal rights is not that women may vote and otherwise perform a function which has hitherto been performed by men, but that in doing so she may become less of a woman and more of a man.

It is not at all surprising that a generation of women who have received the same education as men, have studied the same books, imbibed the same ideals, should desire to lead the same life. The wonder is that this desire should have been so long in finding expression, and that it is now so limited.

The eternal and immutable nature of the feminine soul is the only possible explanation of this, and it is at the same time the sufficient foundation for the hope that even if suffrage and all other equal rights come that the elements of beauty and truth inherent in the feminine soul may still be bodied forth in visions of loveliness to soothe the spirit of man.

WHEN woman, lovely woman, shops,
If she is young or old,
Or rich or poor, or very plain,
Or charming to behold,
I can not see the reason why,
By crazy caprice led,
She gets a hat a mile too big
To fit her pretty head.

Or when she seeks another store
A pair of shoes to buy,
With buckles big and flaunting bows,
And heels so very high,
Although she wears a number three,
She's certain to refuse
The proper size to suit her feet,
And calls for number twos.

The Personal Factor in Education

By DUMAS MALONE

Professor of Bible and Education Andrew College, Cuthbert, Ga.

DUMAS MALONE.

IT is a far cry from that university which consisted of Mark Hopkins on one end of a log and a boy on the other to most modern institutions of learning. For, while in the one case the personal factor was adjudged of chief importance, in the other it is almost entirely neglected.

It is a matter of common observation that university professors rarely know their pupils outside the classroom. They come, deliver their learned lectures, and then depart to live until the next lecture a life wholly apart from that of their pupils.

In the colleges for men, while conditions are not so bad, there is yet far too little personal contact between teachers and pupils. Even in schools for girls and women, the individual pupil is often practically unknown to her teachers, and is lost in the crowd, left to work out as best she can her own salvation.

The greatest lessons of life are taught, not by word, but by deed. He is the truest teacher who not only tells his pupils what to do, but also shows them how to do it. The greatest inspiration toward higher living comes not so much from hearing or reading great addresses, articles or sermons, as in seeing some great life. Hence, real contact between teachers and pupils is of vital importance.

In view of this fact, the present situation in our country in this regard is deplorable. In this paper the matter is considered with reference to boarding schools of high school grade and above. Some reasons for the present situation are noted and some suggestions are made looking toward the betterment of conditions.

The first reason why there is today so little personal contact between teachers and pupils is that there are, in most instances, too few of the former in proportion to the number of the latter. The material equipment and the enrollment in American institutions have grown much faster than have the faculties. Hence, in many instances, teachers have so many classes to meet and so much work to do that they have no time to take an interest in their pupils. The classes, furthermore, are often very much too large for anyone to teach them perfectly, certainly far too large for any teacher to know every member of them.

In many schools and colleges today teachers and pupils live in different worlds. The students live in dormitories on or near the campus; the teachers often live in entirely different parts of the town or city, so they can not enter very readily into the student life.

Even under the adverse conditions of city life, though, there would probably be closer association between teachers and pupils did not that old feeling of antagonism between them yet linger the land. So strong is this feeling that, in some cases, a student who is friendly with the faculty is deemed somewhat as a traitor to his fellows and as one who is trying to make himself popular with the teachers in the hope of securing some favor for himself. Likewise, in some instances, a teacher who is friendly with his pupils is thought to be but a seeker after popularity.

There is yet another reason for this lack of contact. The prime aim of university education is the acquisition of knowledge on the part of the students, or, at least, the training of ability to seek out and to acquire. This conception of the aim of education has crept down into schools where the acquisition of knowledge is of but secondary importance. Certainly the development of character is of prime moment in the high school, and at least the lower classes of the college. Where any teacher feels that it is his chief duty to bring information to his pupils, he will often be content to do nothing more. If, however, he feels it his duty to develop manhood and womanhood, he will make greater effort really to know those whom he teaches.

Now, this situation, while difficult to meet, may yet be improved in several ways. For one thing, while universities may well be very large, colleges and boarding schools of lower grade ought always to be comparatively small. It is, of course, difficult, if not impossible, to determine what is the ideal size for any particular school. Just a few days ago the writer heard a distinguished educator declare that 200 is the ideal number for a college. While many, doubtless, will not fully agree with him, it is certain that a school of such size affords much greater opportunity for personal contact between teachers, officers and pupils than does one which is larger.

Yet any suggestion that the number of students be reduced would, I fear, fall upon deaf ears in most instances. Colleges don't care to seem to be growing backward, and it is hardly likely that many of them will voluntarily reduce their student bodies. All of them, though, can at least increase the number of teachers so as to make the faculties more in keeping with the number of students. There is, indeed, a very marked tendency among American schools and colleges in this direction.

Classes, likewise, should be made much smaller. Some of our best Southern colleges have yet as many as 50 in some of their classes. A class of half that size would be large enough. The tendency toward small classes is now very marked in our country; everywhere large classes are being divided into sections. This secures a better quality of class work and makes it possible for the teacher to know every pupil.

There should be, furthermore, a fuller recognition on the part of both teachers and pupils of the true aim of education and of the value of personal contact. Such a subject would furnish very profitable discussion in a faculty meeting and would be a very interesting topic for a teacher to speak to the students about at some student service. Everyone who recognizes the value of association between teacher and taught should do all in his power to break down the barrier which now exists between them.

In addition to the teachers, there should be in every institution officers whose duty it is to provide some home life for the students. Dormitories for boys and young men are usually entirely devoid of home life and even in schools for girls, a dormitory is often more like a hotel than a home. There should be in every dormitory some woman, or more than one, who makes it her business to take a personal interest in the boarders and who tries to be, as far as possible, a mother to them.

In many of the smaller girls' colleges of the South the president and his family live in the school, and the president's wife is mother to the household. Such life and such service often require great sacrifice, but this is perhaps the best possible way to provide a home life which is attractive and beneficial.

Whatever may be the best way to solve it, this problem of how to bring in the personal factor is well worthy of the careful consideration of all who are interested in schools and school life. Certainly any line of solution must seek to secure college homes in place of college hotels, and instead of teachers who are mere lecture-making, examination-giving, theme-correcting machines, to secure those who have hearts as well as heads and who will love as well as teach their pupils into a nobler and better life.

How the Boy Chooses His College

Mr. Wiggins was a student at Emory College (A. B., 1903), at Vanderbilt University (M. A., 1907), at the University of Chicago and Columbia University. He has taught in the public schools of Georgia and in Wofford College, South Carolina; has visited representative colleges of the East, and has just completed three months' traveling among the high schools of Georgia in the interest of the School of Technology.

By ROBERT L. WIGGINS, JR.

ROBERT L. WIGGINS, JR.

THE boy is the thing. The successful college reaches the boy. The defunct college failed to reach the boy. The land, the buildings, the books, the apparatus, the faculty, the trustees, the parents—all are for the boy.

The Boy is for the boy. This forms the issue. Not the boy that used to be, nor the boy that ought to be, but the living, moving boy that IS—this is the boy with whom the college must reckon, grasp hold upon, and, through very prayer and fasting, mould into the man that may be.

"14 UNITS' CREDIT" makes about the most independent citizen of our republic to-day. Down here in Georgia, for instance, who said this boy had to go to Emory? Who said he had to go to Tech? Who said he could not go to the Business College? Who said he should not take a Job? Who said he had to work? Now during the past four months I have been graciously granted a personal interview with some less than a thousand of these young sovereigns, and, believe me, every "had to" and "had not to" concerning them is but an echo of their own wishes.

Boys Pick Their Alma Mater.

Not one out of ten will go to Tech or Georgia, Emory or Mercer, as a result of the exercise of parental authority. When I began my recent work for the Georgia School of Technology among the Georgia High School boys I thought that I would be rendering very inefficient service if I failed to sit up with the old folks, not entirely overlooking the Hopeful. But I had to get wiser. My request to the first boys was, "To your own name, add the address of your parents, so that I may see them also." No parent's address was given. Being still something of an ambitious boy myself, I chuckled over the usual boy's proud independence, and quietly took each parent's address from the teacher's roll-book. (Of course the teacher must have the names of those who pay the bills). However, when I reached the father's place of business, told him my mission, and got his reply, I sat up and took notice.—"I have not heard him say what he was going to do," said one father.

"Good night," said I.

I continued to look up the parents, however, until I was rewarded by finding a good Methodist father and mother who said, "We cannot consent to our boy's being at college in a big city like Atlanta; and we are going to send him to Emory where there is no intercollegiate football and baseball."

This sounded like the voices of parental authority from long ago, about which we have often heard. Nevertheless I was not entirely unprepared for the next week's encounter with the boy. I was giving sincere praise to Emory, recalling some of my own pleasant student experiences at Oxford, when he broke in with, "I'll be at Tech next year."

"But," said I, "your father said he was going to send you to Emory."

"No, I am going to Tech," said the boy. Will you guess with me where to find him next year?

Influences That Move Them.

So in education to-day it is as in matrimony. And the successful college knows what influences move these boys, and makes an appeal directly to the boys. If it was not always so, how did it come about?

In the first place, this 14-UNIT BOY is not going unsophisticatedly about his high school work, waiting for his teacher or his parents to direct him to the college of their predilection. Some years ago the University of Athens put in the field a Professor of Secondary Education a part of whose business is to join the teachers of the high schools in giving information to the boys about the institutions for higher education. The Georgia School of Technology soon put its own representative in the field also, and Emory has taken steps toward the same plan. These field men from the colleges will tell the boys everything, and flood them with catalogues and bulletins. The newspapers carry columns of thrilling news from the colleges everywhere. The boy's own proud school paper goes out to scores of colleges, bringing in scores of handsomely illustrated exchanges that make the buildings and campus scenes of the various colleges perfectly familiar, and furnish graphic accounts of their student life.

Not only can the 14-unit boy of to-day read, but he can also travel. Every district provides for a great May-day gathering of all its schools for friendly literary and athletic contests. Some professor, and probably a number of students and active alumni from every wideawake college are present to encourage the High School boys and incidentally promote the interests of their colleges. Many school communities to-day have several boys in several colleges. These fellows may have the next year's prospective students as guests at their colleges during the session. At the vacation camp and house party, where boys gather from various communities, college talk is rife. Every whole-souled boy will be championing the college of his choice, and will be forced to do some pretty sound reasoning. Nor will the modern father and mother be likely to blight his enthusiasm.

Enthusiasm Over Athletics.

Is the boy's choice of his college, then, necessarily ignorant and reckless? What are the influences that move him?

Most boys are to-day expending their wild, but normal, enthusiasm on athletics. In the High School and "Prep" circles it's a slow and uninteresting fellow who does not know by heart the records of all the college football and baseball games, and the whole family history and life—prospects of every diamond and gridiron star. His own school doubtless has developed its local athletic celebrities whose written invitations (with transportation) to the intercollegiate games, and personal letters, from the famous coaches are posted with pride on the bulletin board. Incidentally, "Coach" is utterly inefficient if he overlooks any of these "promising materials," failing to show them, through properly appointed committees and personally, all the courtesies of the day. The boy is very likely to be predisposed toward the college with which he has come to associate his athletic interest.

The personal touch is always a strong influence. If the boy has met some member of the faculty, he feels that he has a friend in that college, and will incline toward it. The traveling Professor of Secondary Education with personal magnetism will keep in cordial relationship with all the teachers, and, through his friendly approach, draw boys from evey school. The same influence will be exerted by other popular professors as they visit various schools on auspicious occasions. The president whose students scatter words of affectionate devotion everywhere will become a real and attractive personality to the High School boys, before his own kindly face, genial manner, and hearty handshake reaches them directly. Brothers, cousins, and friends will of course draw later students after them. The boy will be influenced by loyal alumni—his teachers, mature friends of the family, and the younger men.

Church and political affiliations of the family carry great weight with the boy.

He Realizes the Advantages.

But let me assure you that you have unjustly discounted the hard sense of the 14-unit boy, if you have concluded that the mere allurements of athletics, personal magnetism, family affiliations, etc., carry him beyond a pretty calm weighing in his mind of the real advantages to him of each college. The general amenities of the student life, and the accepted rank of the college with particular reference to the general line of study he wishes to pursue, will receive his surprisingly keen consideration. Competitive advertisements of everything from chewing gum to transoceanic steamers have held the eye of this boy since he first learned to read, and have had no little to do with the development of his independent reasoning. The High School graduate of to-day, before choosing his college, is going to know what sort of campus and buildings there are, lecture halls, laboratories, and dormitories; how far he will have to go to the shower baths, and how well regulated is the heating system; how well his room will be kept, and what kind of table fare he can get. The literary, musical, athletic, and other activities of the students are going to be weighed on their merits. That wonderful thing called "College Spirit," involving faculty, students, and alumni, will make its powerful appeal to him. He is going to ascertain the intra-mural social customs and possibilities of the students and the general social, cultural, and business advantages incident to the location of the college.

Finally, I found from my interviews with so many modern High School boys that they are fairly sensitive to the prevailing standards at the various colleges; that many of them have felt their talent and aptitude; and that they are selecting their college with these things in mind.

So does the boy choose his college. The Fifth Commandment is at the foundation of our republic. But is not more honor due to the boy who can defend his choice, than to the father who has neglected the comradeship of his boy for business and to the mother who has sold the heart of her boy for a mess of society? Fathers and mothers who wish to play a part in the great game of their son's education, have got to play the game with the boy fair and square, at every point, from start to finish.

The three buildings are modern and comfortable, being equipped with steam heat, waterworks, electric lights, electric bells and inter-communicating telephones. $20,000 has been expended within the past year for improvements.

Cuthbert is 526 feet above the sea level, the highest point in South Georgia, and the healthfulness of the town is exceptional. The health record of the college household is almost perfect.

The courses of study in literary and special departments are in keeping with modern tendencies in education, and are under the direction of teachers who are thoroughly qualified for their work. Courses in home economics and normal training are a feature. The officers and teachers number 17.

The cost is low, ranging from $178 to $196 for board, tuition and general fees. Additional charge is made for music, art and expression.

The president, his family, and all except one of the teachers live in the college home. All know all the pupils by name and take a personal interest in each. Since the boarding patronage is limited to 120, real home life is possible.

The Man and His Government

This is, in part, the address which Senator James Hamilton Lewis, of Illinois, delivered at the commencement exercises of the University of Georgia.

SEN. JAMES HAMILTON LEWIS.

ON the outer portals of the old University of Padua, made familiar to you by Shakespeare in his reference to the Doctor of Laws in the "Merchant of Venice," can be seen an inscription over the door through which the graduated classes pass out. They face the rising sun as they go out of the door—then turn their faces back to behold the inscription, which propounds the query:

"Which way—and for what?"

You who remember the Sorbonne at Paris, recall that they have adopted this admonishing query, and on their east door is read:

"Qui vis—pourquoi?"

So say I to you: Who are you, and for what came you here? What is the purpose of your to-morrow? Then, recalling the sacrifices made in your dear homes, which enabled you to be here, and those continued sacrifices made by the faculty and teachers since you have been here, and remembering that you are the sons of Georgia, that you are of the noble heritage of the South, the answer to the question must be that you are here to construct a citizenship nobly for God; to direct a government justly for man.

The Ills of Man.

All the ills of man are of government—the government of man, of himself, within himself, or the government of man around himself. The complain of man is not of the thing, but of the effects of things. That which he feels or that which he fears is to be is ever the inciting cause of his despair or his revolt. Since mankind began the struggle for the supremacy of man the problems of government among men have been about the same—varying only in detail.

It is not true—as many of our public men and prominent publications assert—that all is corruption in public life and all is defilement in private home. It is not true that in America honor has perished among men, nor that patriotism has died among Americans. In the souls of reunited citizenship of the republic is the gladsome joy at the mention of America's achievements, and the heart throbs with glory with the naming of Lexington, Concord and Bunker Hill, where our fathers sounded—through the voice of Washington—the death knell of kings in America, and inscribed by the hand of Jefferson the Declaration of Independence, proclaiming the equality of man and the kingship only of God.

The citizenship of America, from the humblest to the highest, from the most powerful to the most lowly, acclaim their land as the supreme of earth, and their people the noblest of mankind. Honor is yet the standard of men in their daily lives, and patriotism their ardent inspiration in the defense of the republic, anywhere, any time, as against the world.

Declaration of People.

In matters of the declaration of the people, spoken of as their legislation, we note the demand for the initiative and referendum in America. This call by the people, to the Legislatures, both State and National, to give up and surrender their privilege to make laws as the representatives of the citizens, this demand of the people that they, by their ballot, directly initiate their own legislation and execute it by their direct action, has been caused by a long-suffering in the betrayal of the people's will—by the representative bodies designated—Legislatures.

After this long endurance, coupled with the experience of much disaster to the interest of the people, and shadowed in the gloom of bribery, pollution and corruption of Legislatures by the instrumentalities which have, for the last twenty years, particularly engaged in these undertakings, the citizenship sought some method by which it may remedy the injustice upon the country and prevent the betrayal of free government and the wrongs to society committed by these different branches of State and National legislatures.

The advocacy of the initiative and referendum was not projected by Americans as a superior agency or a more complete one than that provided by the fathers, modeled after the lessons that the ancient governments of the world had afforded—the initiative and referendum was suddenly advocated because it was the immediate remedy at hand and the immediate protest against the systems which, heretofore right in themselves, had become perverted into wrong and oppression.

The demands were protests against the violations on the part of representatives of their duty to their trust, and as methods to take from these false agents the opportunity of further continuing these infamies upon free government. Had the systems provided by the fathers been obeyed in the spirit, as was devised, there would have been no need for these experiments.

Wrong in the Operation.

Plain is the truth that there is nothing wrong in the machinery created by the fathers—the wrong has been in the mechanics intrusted with the operation of the machinery. There is nothing wrong in the construction of the workshop, but in the workmen intrusted with the duties. The evil is not in the system of government constructed by the fathers, but in the conduct of those who are intrusted to execute the system.

These changes demanded by the people are but to protect themselves against men who debase their office and betray trusts; but, had the office been honorably discharged and the trusts faithfully executed by the men as such, from the sentiments of the heart and dictates of honest mind, there would have been no complaint on the part of the citizenship, nor any outcry against the institutions created for the government of the republic. It was, in the final analysis, but the complaint of citizen against citizen—the cry of disappointment through the agony of betrayal on the part of men against the men intrusted with place and opportunity.

The election of Senators by the direct vote of the people was not demanded as a better system than that which had been devised, under the theory of checks and balances, in our Government, designed by the philosophers who laid our foundations, but because in these elections, as had been prescribed through the Legislatures, the most unspeakable betrayals had been perpetrated upon the republic; corruption and public crime had stolen through the Legislatures in the different States, and the sacredness of the oath of office was a mockery; while the open flaunting of their practices by those who had benefited through the prevailing corruption was the slander to citizenship and the disgrace to the States of the Union.

People's Agents Yielded.

At first, this began through forces and influences which inaugurated the systems to defend themselves against control by the people in those things by which they profited upon the people. Then the agents of the people finally yielded to the blandishments of influence and the course of corruption, and became in common with the originators and perpetrators, and through such succeeded in putting upon the country from time to time a United States Senate that was neither representative of the public will nor expressive of the nation's wisdom or honor, but often of a kind which had reduced the United States Senate to where it could only be designated a proud men's club for special privilege to the privileged few—and these privileged few were often public offenders against the honor of the nation and the liberty of the citizen.

The election of Senators, therefore, by the vote of the people, now secured after 60 years of conflict to obtain such, was but a form of protest on the part of the American against an infamy constantly perpetrated upon him and his country. He took the only method which he believed was the immediate remedy. In adopting this the citizen does not profess that this is the most perfect system. It is a mere expression of his belief that it will remedy the oft-polluted one which he was compelled to endure. Here again it is to be observed that had the man in the citizen contemplated his duties in the discharge of trust, and his obligation as a representative of his fellow men, there would have been no such scenes as shocked the conscience of humanity and polluted the history of America before the eyes of the envious world.

Above all, it is apparent that there is no such thing as government, representative, legislature or voter, except as the same is a mere designation of the occupation of the human man for the time being. Thus we observe that it is the man in the system which either commits or permtis the thing done which violates the sense of honor in his fellow man or wounds the spirit of right as felt by society. Through all, the man remains the author of whatever transpires, as he continues to be the victim of every consequence.

Recall of the Judges.

The recall of judges was likewise a form of protest against that class of judges who by their conduct as officers of justice have defiled the high places of the judiciary, and in serving personal and private interests while in their office as judges, have caused the nation to dispute the claim that justice was either free or equal. This drove the people to assert that justice is favorable to the powerful and so expensive to the humble as to be denied to the lowly. It is the conduct of such judges and such officers of the law, speaking through their life and service, as men, that has brought our fellow citizens to cry forth that courts are a persecution, the law a delusion, and justice an instrument purchasable for the use of those who may fit themselves to it, but a rack and torture to those who may not control with money or influence this mechanism.

To save the nation from a repetition of scandals and the further developments of judicial debasement on the part of certain judges of America, the demand for their recall was instituted as a weapon that could affright them into doing justice to the people and in preserving honor to their office. It is not assumed by those who demand the recall that this policy can change the character of the men, nor that it is the perfect system to remedy the wrong of the law. But it was the one at hand, and if violently used, such, it was claimed, would be justified by the wrongs which called for drastic and quick remedy.

At such moments, the mind of man is as violent in his remedies as were the perpetrators of the offenses merciless in their crimes against the public. The dastard defiance of those in power awakes the uncontrolled indignation of those who are compelled to suffer the outrage.

The Cycle of Laws.

In all of these instances we note the cycle in the course of man. We went back to the institutions under Athelstyne—King of Kent, in England—to reproduce the initiative and referendum upon modern America. We returned to the demand as made by the Gracchi in Rome to remove the debasement in the election of United States Senators; and there are those that demand we revive the custom of the Roman Republic when it recalled the judge, Valerius, for corruption. Thus we see that in order that we may have in the modern institutions of America some remedy for the present evils, we return to the same remedy which the first republic of Rome adopted for similar evils, when that republic was disgraced by its men of Rome. Here again we note that, at all times, the artificial creations designated officers or institutions have really no life; that the heart and spirit is yet but the man, the individual, who, in cooperation with another or many, becomes the institution, and that the institution can never become harmful until the individual as a man initiates himself the privilege of betrayal for profit; then practices corruption for gain; then the debasement of trusts that he might exercise tyranny or enjoy the privilege of lawlessness.

My fellow-students, wisdom in man is not proven in only pointing out the nature and whereabouts of the evils, but it is in declaring and exhibiting just remedies for the cure of the wrong, and providing for the re-establishment of society on a moral, healthy and prosperous basis.

The problems lie in the cure, which, as it lances the wound, should still preserve the life of the patient. It is not statesmanship or humanity to prescribe destruction of the establishment of men or government as a penalty for some affliction visited upon the body politic.

Then, where shall we look for remedy? I answer, this hour looks to you, and the morrows will never excuse for the day's failure. The future of all things of men or government rests with men. You are that man. It is within you that all things hoped for by you may be had. It is interesting to us to contemplate the manner through which the remedy may be secured.

The History of Mercer

By L. D. NEWTON.

ON June 4th Mercer University closed its seventy-fifth year of service to the State of Georgia and to the Baptist denomination. During these years through which Mercer University has passed there have been many interesting phases in its development.

It was at Penfield, Ga., in 1832, that the school was made a university and was opened for young men who desired training along theological and classical lines. For several years the college was presided over by Rev. B. M. Sanders. He was followed by Rev. Otis Smith. Dr. J. L. Dagg was the next president, and it was in 1846 that Prof. Joseph E. Willet graduated and was immediately elected to a chair which he filled until 1893.

There is one man who stands out above all others in the history of Mercer University—Jesse Mercer. It was through his efforts that Mercer has been able to reach so many young men in Georgia. He gave very liberally, both in time and money, to the school, and no more fitting name for the university could have been found than that of this noble man.

Notables Who Graduated.

In 1854 Rev. N. M. Crawford became president. It was during these years that many of Georgia's notable men for the last half of the nineteenth century were graduated from Mercer. The faculty in those days had the following great teachers: Dr. Tucker, Dr. Williams, Dr. Mell, Professor Wise, Dr. Willet, Dr. Hillyer and Dr. Sanford.

Some of the great men who went out in these first years of Mercer were: Richard Malcolm Johnson, J. E. Willet, Noah K. Davis, W. L. Kilpatrick, R. B. Hubbard, R. D. Mallary, J. G. Ryals, A. T. Spalding, E. B. Steed, J. H. Kilpatrick, Geo. R. McCall, W. J. Northen, George Hillyer, V. T. Sanford, T. G. Lawson, A. J. Cheney, H. D. McDaniel, R. E. Lester and A. D. Candler. This list includes the names of authors, governors, congressmen, ministers, teachers and other men of affairs who have been conspicuous in shaping the destiny of the State and the Nation.

It was then that the war came, and the college was suspended for several years. It is interesting to listen to men like Col. R. H. Harris, of Cairo, tell how the Mercerians put aside their collegiate duties and went to the front to take their places in the notable struggle.

When the war was over, the question of moving Mercer came up and in 1871 the college was formally opened in Macon. Dr. Tucker was the first president in Macon. The law school was established in 1873. Dr. A. J. Battle succeeded Dr. Tucker and after serving seventeen years, he was followed by Dr. Nunnally. Dr. Gambrell was the next president and after his resignation Prof. Poolock became chairman, later becoming the president of the college and serving till his health failed him. It was in 1903 that Prof. J. F. Sellers founded the School of Pharmacy. Dr. C. L. Smith was made president of the University in 1905, and in 1906 Dr. S. Y. Jameson became president.

This is merely a brief survey of Mercer University's past. To go into any detailed history is impracticable. Through all these years, Mercer has been wielding a great influence in the educational and religious life of the

The present plant is well equipped, and is being improved from time to time to meet the needs of the students. The new Students' Hall is perhaps one of the very best college dormitories in the State. It has all the modern conveniences and is located very conveniently to all the buildings. The Library has been built only a few years and is a very creditable college library. It contains about 9,000 volumes of standard literature and is under the direction of Miss Sallie Boone, a most capable and well trained librarian.

The Y. M. C. A. enjoys the use of a splendid building known as the Selman Hall. This phase of the college life at Mercer is well taken care of. The gymnasium, built by the alumni, is fitted throughout with first class equipment, and is a valuable asset to the campus. In this connection it is fitting to say a word about Mercer's athletics. The college has four teams, football, basketball, baseball and track team. These teams are all open to students, and the varsity teams, together with the class teams, afford splendid opportunity for physical development.

The new chair of Physical Culture which has been added insures a safe and sane position in regard to athletics for the whole student body. There will be opportunity given to every boy in college for participation in some form of athletics, and this broadening of the scope of the work that is so essential to the building of a sound body in which the sound mind is to dwell indicates the progressive policy of the college.

The glee club is one of the activities that is very valuable to students. The brass band and orchestra are other musical organizations of the college. The literary societies are fine training schools in debate and oratory. The publications, The Mercerian, a monthly magazine, The Orange and Black, a weekly newspaper, and an annual, The Cauldron, are valuable assets to the students.

Esthetic Environment

By MARY CARTER WINTER

SUBTLE influences that mold mind and character are very apt to be discounted by people who do not think deeply, or those who do not observe and correlate impressions, but the majority of those who watch, compare, analyze and study as far as possible the mental make-up of the people with whom they come in contact have found out to what surprising degree habits of thought, and consequently character, have been influenced by the things of which people are but vaguely conscious from day to day.

Undefined, unnoted relations with friends and acquaintances, the chance book that falls accidentally into one's hands, a conversation heard on the streets, or in the cars, that sets into motion a new process of thought, the neighborhood in which one lives and the very houses themselves all help to a much larger degree than is commonly recognized in molding and changing character, after all, is but the product of the influences, both subtle and definable, that surround a person from day to day.

Influence of Environment.

It is also true that men and women in their later life unconsciously or consciously envelop themselves in the atmosphere to which they grew accustomed in the surroundings of their younger days. It is for this reason that the student and the educator insist that the child and, later, the collegian shall be environed by cheerful, healthful and beautiful surroundings. This knowledge that the minds of the students will reflect just the atmosphere of school or college environment leads schools and colleges of the State to yearly give more attention to the mere physical equipment of their institutions, and no better illustration of an educator's belief in the influences of material environment can be found than in Brenau College, at Gainesville, Ga., where years of intelligent and interested planning have established building after building, all harmoniously constructed, and all spaciously and beautifully arranged within and without.

Instead of the usual narrow, ugly halls and unsightly walls, the small, ill-lighted rooms, the occasional bath room, that used to be the inevitable interior of the older college buildings in the State, one finds more and more frequently nowadays light, airy corridors, bright and cheerful rooms, well-lighted and well-ventilated, arranged not only with regard to health and convenience, but with an eye to beauty and attractiveness as well.

From campus entrance to the kitchen no pains have been spared in arranging suitable surrounds for the hundreds of young women who are to honor the State after graduation, and as a result every building on the college reservation is of harmonious design, each being related in architecture and material to its predecessor; and even the various chapter houses of the sororities are perfect little models of architectural art. The college parlors—as beautiful as any in a private home of wealth—are an education in themselves in artful combinations of color, in artistic frescoeing; and a visit to the three rooms, the Italian parlor, the Chinese room and the Egyptian room, enables one to form a clear conception of the scenery methods of interior arrangements in the house of each, and of the art of the three countries.

Spacious and Artistic Rooms.

The dining halls are large and the decorative treatment of the walls is dignified and tasteful; the big auditorium, the class rooms, the offices, are all fitted up in the very best of taste; while the campus, the parks, the little country club, have all been designed by artists.

The effect upon the students is inevitable. Those who came from wealthy and tasteful homes are not offended by soiled and unbeautiful surroundings. They fit mentally into the environment provided for them, and in comfort and happiness devote their time to acquiring the intellectual and artistic education that they want.

The girl who goes from an humbler home, where less attention has been given to esthetics, sanitation and modern conveniences, at once finds something intensely interesting to her, aside from the studies which she takes up. Stimulated by this interest, her mind opens receptively to every new impression. Viewing in the parlors the harmonious combination of colors, she suddenly realizes that her pink tie does not look well with her red dress, and that three or four fighting shades of colors in her attire are not conducive to her satisfaction. Off they come, and gradually she has learned the art of quiet and tasteful dressing. Accustomed to light and airy rooms, clean as a new pin, she finds on returning to her home that her own rooms must be kept tidy and clean if she is to live in happiness in it; and often the girl who, because of untidiness, was a sore trial to her mother before she went to college, returns home so keen to keep things fresh and clean that it takes two new brooms instead of one for the household.

Unconscious Assimilation.

Being constantly surrounded with dignified and handsome buildings, she has learned also something of architectural line; she has become accustomed to properly arranged walks on the campus, to beautiful flower arrangements in the gardens; to subdued shadows and contrasting lights—in fact, all through her college life, while she has delved in books, explored history, learned mathematical precision, made friends of authors and their creations, while she has learned chemistry, household economics, French and German, Latin, philosophy and Biblical literature, and all the other things which she gains only through hard and continuous study, she has unconsciously acquired, from the beauty and charm of the college environment, the soft, subtly shaded mental background which throws into prominence the more tangible body of her learning, just as the dull, subdued weavings of a tapestry form the setting for the brilliant figures which grace it.

She has unconsciously assimilated taste and discrimination, perceptive powers for elusive qualities, a hundred lovely things that books alone could never teach; and the chambers of her mind have opened into sunny spaces, adorned with the tapestries of subtle influence, illuminated with imaginative pictures, and furnished solidly with the educative utilities which she will need in maturer womanhood.

The Progress Made By One Prep School

THIRTEEN years ago leading citizens of College Park organized themselves in united effort to have a great prep school and induced Colonel J. C. Woodward, who had already done signal service in several other cities in schools, to found the Georgia Military Academy.

The modest beginning with one other teacher, one building and a limit of 40 boys has rapidly grown to a large faculty of distinguished educators, a beautiful campus, seven handsome buildings, with every modern sanitary comfort, and an equipment which easily takes rank with the very best in any State.

Last year the student body numbered about 185, from some 20 States, Mexico and Cuba.

The school represents the spirit of progress on every public occasion and has three times represented the city and State in Washington in inaugural parades. Its standards are high and the young men who attend the school come from leading homes.

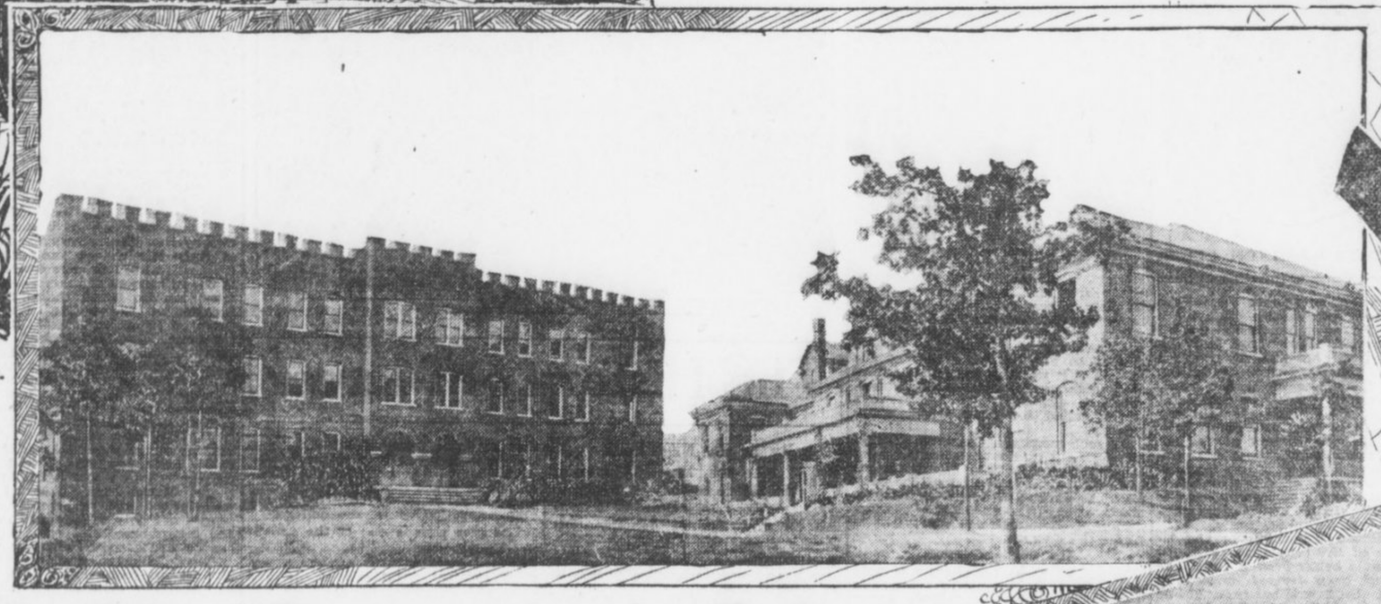
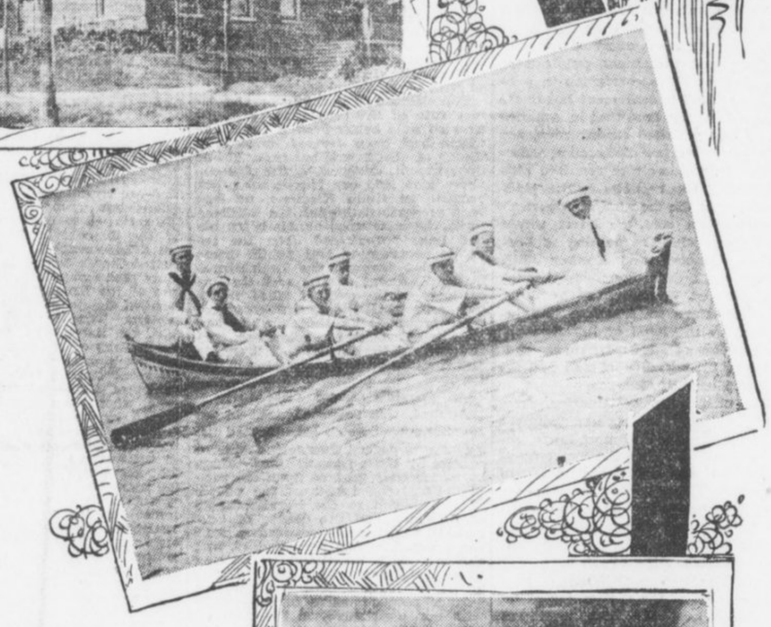
THE SOUTH'S MOST MODERNLY EQUIPPED PREP SCHOOL.

RIVERSIDE MILITARY ACADEMY





An Ideal Preparatory School

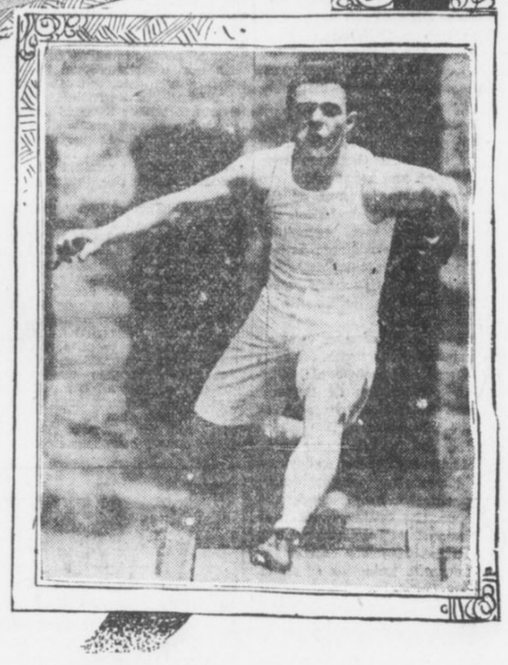
The requisites for an ideal preparatory school for boys were never more completely or concisely told than in naming the superior advantages offered by RIVERSIDE MILITARY ACADEMY : : : : : :

UNSURPASSED LOCATION. Two miles out from Gainesville, the healthiest city in the South, among the foothills of the Blue Ridge Mountains; occupying the center of a magnificent park, comprising 2,000 acres, on the banks of the famous Chattahoochee River and adjoining beautiful Lake Warner, it offers the attractions of woodland and water with their many kindred sports and pleasures.

BUILDINGS AND EQUIPMENT. The dormitories, mess hall, class rooms, built of brick and stone, are equipped with every modern convenience; steam heat, electric lights, hot and cold shower and tub baths on each floor. Every room is an outside room, has at least one window, a large transom and a roomy closet. There is no boys' school in all the South that equals Riverside's rooming equipment. A gymnasium, with its own private shower bath room, is located in the main building. No boy's room is over fifty yards from the dining hall, chapel and class rooms, thus obviating inconveniences during inclement weather.

ACCOMPLISHED FACULTY. By training and experience the corps of instructors are unexcelled. There is a graduate instructor for every twelve boys. They live in immediate touch with the cadets, teaching them how to study, bringing to the highest point of efficiency the tutorial system, which enables cadets to make fifty per cent faster progress than was possible under the old method. No cadet's room in entire dormitory system is more than three doors from a teacher, or teacher's wife, thus affording faculty supervision day and night.

The Place For Your Son



INTELLECTUAL AND MORAL ATMOSPHERE—Gainesville, Ga., is far-famed as one of the most moral communities in the South. It has more churches, better ones, and perhaps the largest number of active church workers in proportion to population of any city in the State. The home of BRENAU COLLEGE, with its national patronage of six hundred girls, contributes largely to the city's classic and literary atmosphere. The Academy is connected by direct trolley with the city, putting at the disposition of the cadets city life in its most attractive form, and at the same time leaving the school in the country, removed from interruptions, temptations and distractions.

ATHLETIC SUPREMACY—Riverside has long furnished the leading colleges of the South some of their most splendid athletes. Athletics are encouraged under faculty supervision. Experienced coaches are secured for every athletic team. Often three and four teams are put out in each sport, each under the direction of a faculty coach. The Varsity team is usually recruited from the second and third teams of the previous year. Every boy, no matter his size or age, who has a taste for any form of athletics is encouraged and given an opportunity to develop this inclination. This encouragement is responsible for Riverside's Championship teams.

MILITARY DEPARTMENT—The cadets at Riverside are noted for their snappy appearance, which is augmented by a uniform identical with that of the United States Military Academy at West Point, N. Y. These uniforms are fitted by military tailors at the Academy, each suit to the form of the cadet who wears it. The large parade-ground and campus acreage with its water frontage afford splendid opportunity for drills, skirmishes, bridge building, and target practice. The academy is operated under strict military discipline with one of the foremost cadet commandants in the South in charge.

PATRONAGE EXCLUSIVE—The cadet corps at Riverside is recruited annually from those families in the South who appreciate a modern military academy, where healthfulness is unquestioned; equipment modern; moral tone high; atmosphere intellectual and instructors proficient. We insist that you visit the school and compare its equipment, surroundings, etc., with the best in America. Barrack room limited. References required. Fall term opens September 11th.

Why Newport Should Worry.

The "Turkey Leg," Naughty Bathing Costumes and Mrs. Thomas' Artistic Temperament —No Wonder Society's Upset!

WHAT means this atmosphere of gloom that overhangs the Newport colony? Why does every member of the colony look worried to death, and why is every one, from Mrs. Bobbie Goelet to Miss Margaret Andrews, walking like crabs? And why does every one dodge Mrs. Leonard Thomas?

To all outward appearances Newport was never facing a more brilliant season. Dances are scheduled to fill every hour of every day until September. There is everything to make the next two months gay and joyous. Why, therefore, does this air of gloom and worry pervade the colony?

Why do the members of the dancing set stop and feel of their own right legs every once in a while during the play hours at the Casino? Why does Reggie Vanderbilt, who is growing fatter every minute, stop in the middle of a tennis game and suddenly shake his left leg frantically twenty times in the air? Why at the same time does Mrs. Sidney Colford stop in the midst of a conversation with the stately Mrs. Henry Clews and begin to shake her right leg furiously in the air?

Why does Mrs. Craig Biddle stop in the very act of walking across the lawn to let her handsome husband take hold of her left ankle and pull it frantically? Why, oh, why these curious sights?

Oh, Gloom! Reggie, Mrs. Colford, Mrs. Biddle and all the other members of the Circus Set are facing the dangers of the Turkey Leg (and Mrs. Thomas's artistic temperament).

What is the Turkey Leg? And why should it worry Newport? It is the dread disease that follows continued dancing of the Turkey Trot. It causes the legs to stiffen, makes them throb painfully, and in time will make one leg grow shorter.

Mrs. William Payne Thompson, Whose Hostility to the Split Bathing Skirts Is Another of Newport's Worries.

Can one imagine Newport going through life on one leg? Can one imagine Newports's well-powdered face always wearing a grimace of pain? Indeed no.

"Would you avoid the turkey leg, would you avoid going through life with one leg shorter than the other? Then stop trotting," said the doctors. "Or, if trot you must, then you must shake your legs for twenty minutes every day and have them pulled as often as possible."

And this accounts for the very peculiar —one might say scandalous—actions of the Circus Set. The stranger who ventures into the Casino or who finds hiself accepting the hospitality of the colony must not be surprised at anything he sees.

But there is more. The Turkey Leg is not the only worry that causes gloom. The leg is bad, but the split-skirt bathing costume is worse. There are bathing costumes displayed on the beach daily that would make Anthony Comstock cry for colored glasses.

The crowning feature of this naughty costume, as Newport calls it, is the split. It may be as deep as the wearer dares. It is all a matter of daring anyway. The dumpy, fat woman does not wear it. She says it is scandalous. (Neither does Mrs. Thomas wear it.)

The social leaders are worried. They do not know how to handle the situation. When Mrs. Willie Carter made her debut on the beach the other day there was horror. Mrs. Carter is blond, petite and pretty. Mrs. Carter's bathing skirt was also petite and pretty. It was, however, mostly split. But this was only the beginning. There are now a dozen such costumes seen daily, and as Mrs. Fish said a few days ago, "No one can foretell where the split will stop."

Newport is worried. It lives in constant fear that some modest subscriber to the beach will send Mr. Comstock a card of admission, and it wakes every day with the thought that that may be the appointed time for a scandal.

As a last resort the leaders have urged the beautiful Mrs. William Thompson (who was Edith Blight) to help them. Mrs. Thompson is a great favorite, and may be able to bring peace to Newport's worried soul.

But there is more. The Turkey Leg is bad, the naughty bathing skirt is worse, but Mrs. Len Thomas's artistic temperament is the worst. Mrs. Thomas, who was Blanche Oelrichs and is one of the prettiest young matrons in Newport, has taken to painting. She has had a studio added to her home, and every day she paints.

She yearns to paint her friends. She follows them everywhere, even to Bailey's Beach, where no camera has ever been able to snap the female form divine. But Mrs. Thomas is doing something far worse! She is painting the forms in their naughty split skirts. Her friends are worried to death for fear she will get them unawares, and they run like mad whenever she appears in sight with her palette and brush.

Life is no longer worth living for these unlucky women who claim Blanche Thomas for their friend. A horrible rumor is flitting along Bellevue avenue to the effect that she has already painted six of the young women as sea nymphs, and one matron flirting with a man not her husband.

No, there is nothing so bad as Mrs. Thomas's artistic temperament. Why shouldn't Newport worry?

NEW DISCOVERIES ALL OVER THE EARTH

Why Your VACATION In the Country Does You GOOD

IT seems, according to careful recent experiments, that much we have learned of the value of oxygen, of the open bedroom window at night and the poison of carbonic acid gas is erroneous. In the first place, city air and country air are exactly alike chemically; there is not a bit more oxygen in the country nor less carbonic acid gas than in the city.

Even if there were twice as much or even three or four times as much, it wouldn't interfere with our health. These things seem against all reason, yet they are true, even to the extent that our old "enemy," carbonic acid gas, isn't a poison or an enemy at all.

The lungs apparently want to have the air they contain hold just six per cent of carbonic acid gas. The ordinary atmosphere of outdoors in the city or country carries less than one per cent. If the carbonic acid gas is artifically decreased in the atmosphere the lungs at once breathe more slowly, so that they give out the gas with less speed and let it accumulate to the desired six per cent. If the carbonic acid gas is allowed to accumulate in a room the lungs breathe a little faster, but nobody notices it if the percentage is doubled or trebled. When it is increased to six times the normal amount, or the same as the lungs themselves contain, then the breathing becomes labored and exercise causes distress.

In the same way all sorts of liberties may be taken with the oxygen contents of the air and no disturbance is caused. So it isn't the oxygen we get nor the carbonic acid gas we avoid that does us good on our vacation outing.

Experiments have been made in an air-tight room in which half a dozen young men were confined. The oxygen was reduced and the carbonic acid gas increased until the young men found they could not light matches and their cigarettes went out.

They ceased their laughing and became uneasy, remarking that the experiment had gone far enough. Sweat poured out upon their bodies and they were obviously in distress. One of them demanded oxygen, saying they were all choking.

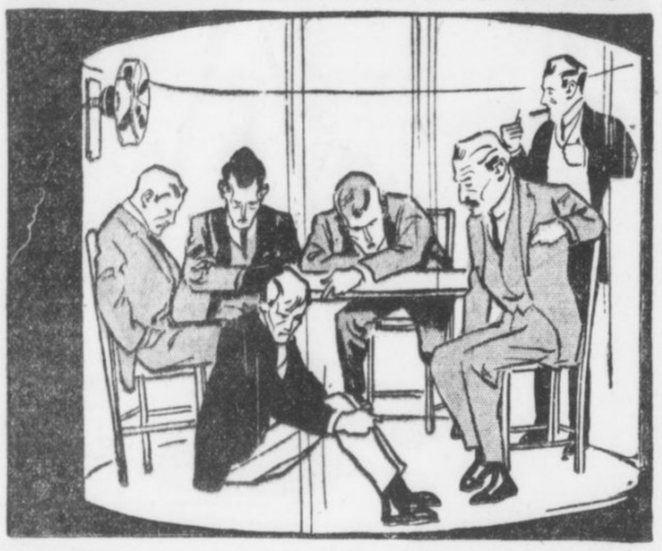
"All right," said the scientist who was watching them through a glass window. He pressed a button and started a powerful electric fan in the top of the air-tight room. This drove a column of air down upon the group of sweating, choking men.

At once they felt comfortable and returned to their laughing and joking until the end of the experiment. They were all convinced that the scientist had driven in some oxygen gas or at least some fresh air when the electric fan started.

As a matter of fact he had not changed the air in the least, but merely caused it to circulate. This rapid movement of the atmosphere removed the moist, superheated air from the clothes and around the skin and gave the bodies a chance to cool. The entire discomfort had come not from the "badness" of the air, but from heat and moisture combined with lack of motion.

So it is with "bad air." We never notice how much or how little oxygen or carbonic acid gas is in what we breathe, but we do feel and resent humidity and heat especially if the air is not moving.

Another thing affects us powerfully through the nervous system—and that is smell. Unpleasant odors may make us even sick, but they are no indication that our lungs are not perfectly contented.



"After remaining for some time in the air-tight room the men began to suffer. Sweat poured out upon their bodies and one of them cried out that he was chocking. The oxygen was reduced and the carbonic acid gas increased to such an extent that they could not light matches and their cigarettes went out."

"As soon as the electric fan was turned on the men in the air-tight chamber began to feel better. They thought the improvement was due to the fact that some oxygen or fresh air had been forced into the chamber, but this was not the case. The fan had relieved their discomfort by setting the air in such rapid motion that it removed the moisture from their clothing and gave their bodies a chance to cool."

IMPORTANT EFFECT of the AIR'S CIRCULATION on Your HEALTH

The reason that heat and moisture upset us so much more than the chemical qualities of the air is the fact that the human body is really a water-cooled motor, exactly like an automobile engine.

Inside of us fuel is constantly being burned up, exploded, and the gases of these explosions are "exhausted" through the lungs. Heat also is created inside us and must be gotten rid of or we would "heat up and stick" like an engine run dry.

The gas engine has a water-jacket surrounding the cylinder. When the water absorbs the heat from the cylinder and carries it to the front of the car it runs through the radiator, which is merely a device to give the water a chance to be cooled by close contact with air. From the radiator it returns to the cylinder jacket.

The blood acts as a water-cooling system. Every organ is surrounded by a jacket and even penetrated by blood vessels. The blood is continually making round trips from the heated interior of the body to the skin, where it gives off the heat to the air. If the surrounding air is cool the system works easily. If the air is warm the pores assist by giving out moisture. This moisture by evaporating accelerates the cooling process. If the air is both hot and moist, the cooling process at once meets difficulties. The air is too hot to absorb the blood's heat and too moist to permit of cooling by evaporation. Therefore, the sweat drops collect, the heart pumps desperately, the veins stand out and distress is evident.

Even in this situation moving the air rapidly by an electric fan or otherwise relieves the discomfort.

Not only does the body need a current of air against the skin to keep cool, but it needs it as a stimulant to all the activities of the body. The human race, like all creatures, has had its main stimulus from outside, and the human engine runs better for an occasional dash of rain in the face or enduring a plunge in cold water or meeting a biting wind.

It is the circulation of air you get in the country, the beating of the sun and the rain in your face that do you good, not the superior quality of the country air, because it isn't superior in any great degree.

Eat ASPARAGUS as a MEDICINE

ASPARAGUS is considered one of the healthiest of quick-growing plants used for food, and is really a medicine as well as a food.

It requires a very rich soil, and thrives best when the soil is given a liberal salting, which in almost every other case would not be good for the plant life. The vegetable grows very rapidly, making a shoot from six to twelve inches tall, and from the size of a lead pencil to that of a good-sized walking stick in one night.

It acts quickly on the secretory organs of the body, and especially the kidneys. Milk is often used in the preparation of this vegetable for food, and it is not wholly put out of commission by the use of the milk, but the vegetable is much more valuable as a kidney tonic if it is cooked in water, and the milk is absent in the dressing. The water carries off the impurities and the milk combined with the asparagus does not do the work so readily. It seems to be a fact that like in many other cases, water is an important factor.

Anyone affected with a light touch of gravel will find that in eating a mess of asparagus cooked and dressed with water and not milk, they will be greatly benefited and relieved, and with little or no pain. The juices of this vegetable do not dissolve the hard particles, but they are carried away with more ease than in any other known manner.

It is well to have plenty of juice with the asparagus when served. When poured over toast it is not injured in any manner, and is a certain relief to certain ills, and it is a wonderful tonic to the kidneys as well as to the entire system.

Asparagus is best during June. After the first week in July it should not be pulled or cut, especially during the following six or eight hot weeks. In September some of the tender stalks may be gathered and served, when it is as good as in Spring or early Summer, but the September gathering is not good for the plants unless the month is wet and quite warm, like April or May.

Canned asparagus will act as a tonic on the kidneys, but is not as good as the fresh vegetable, which is cooked within a few hours after it is gathered.

Experts declare the secret of the value of asparagus lies in the fact it can absorb more salt in growing and in its preparation for the table, than any other form of vegetation used for food.

COFFEE WITHOUT CREAM Does You the LEAST HARM

THE latest investigation of the character of coffee and its effect upon the human system suggests more than one modification of existing ideas. It has been proved that the chief alkaloidal element in coffee is the caffeine, and that this poison acts directly upon the nerves, under certain conditions. But the saner physicians suggest that if coffee be taken not too strong, and only as an adjunct to food the deleterious effect is minimized almost, if not quite, to the vanishing point. The large amount of water taken in the form of coffee is necessary to the system, and aids in the general economy. The danger in taking coffee alone is that its effect is increased tremendously, while if food is taken at the same time the nerves are not so apt to be attacked.

It has also been proved that when milk and sugar are put into the coffee certain chemical changes take place, causing the mixture to become highly indigestible. The omission of the milk makes a great difference in the digestibility, as has been proved by the well-established custom of the French who take black coffee after their meals.

The flavor of the coffee is not due to the caffeine at all, but to its essential oil known as caffeone. This is produced in the process of roasting, and on this account the same coffee properly roasted or too little or too much roasted tastes altogether different.

A process of extracting the caffeine from the coffee has been perfected, and as this is the poisonous element, those who are affected by it had best use the caffeineless coffee which can be obtained generally.

It is not generally known that what we call the coffee-bean is not a bean at all. The blossom of the coffee-plant forms where the leaves meet the stalk, and the blossom develops into a fruit about the size of a cherry, and not unlike it in color when ripe. Inside of this fruit is the seed, usually split in two parts, forming two of our common "beans." These are secured either by drying off the fruit in the sun, or by a wet process in which machinery is used. The seeds when finally secured are dried, and are what we call "green coffee," later to be roasted.

It is generally agreed that coffee first grew wild in Abyssinia, thence being taken to Arabia and afterward to all parts of the civilized world in which it would grow. There are some twenty-five different kinds of coffee found in different parts of Africa, still growing wild in many sections.

The name is supposed to be derived from the Arabic K'hawaw, or from the Abyssinian province of Kaffa.

When first introduced into Arabia in the fifteenth or sixteenth century, it created a great religious scandal. It was utilized by devout Mohammedans that they might more easily keep awake for religious vigils, and some of the priests attacked its use as a violation of the Koran, which forbids all intoxicants. It was so popular, however, that the authorities soon gave way and coffee houses were established all over Arabia, and thence spread even to the continent of Europe, as early as the seventeenth century.

According to the records the first English coffee house was opened in 1652, and became so popular that many others were opened soon afterward.

Now-a-days the "cafe" is the last place in which any one looks for coffee, but originally that was the French name of coffee, and appeared on the sign outside of the coffee houses in Paris. Other drinking was introduced later, until gradually the cafe came to mean a barroom, nothing more.

According to the latest figures Brazil produces about 72 per cent of all the coffee grown in the world, and the Dutch East Indies only 2.3 per cent, so it is easy to see what small chance we have of getting much Java coffee into the United States. As for Mocha coffee, grown in Arabia, so little is produced that hardly a grain could be spared for each inhabitant of the States. And yet we consume about nine-and-a-half pounds of coffee per year for each inhabitant of the United States, while in the Netherlands each person drinks more than fifteen pounds. And yet the Dutch are not the most nervous people in the worldfather are they the most phlegmatic. Thus is another popular theory exploded.

When You're Perfectly Right in KEEPING What You FIND

THERE are a good many popular sayings on matters legal which if followed literally may lead to trouble. The old saying that "Findings Are Keepings," is one of them.

It is true that under the law the finder of lost property is entitled to keep it against all the world except the rightful owner, but he may get himself into serious trouble unless he makes a reasonable effort to locate the real owner.

At least that is so in New York and probably in some of the other States where New York's Penal Code is more or less closely followed. There is a section of that code which provides that, unless he makes a reasonable effort to restore it to its owner, the finder of lost property is guilty of larceny.

Just what amounts to "a reasonable effort," must depend upon the circumstances of each particular case. One would not be expected to go to any considerable expense to locate the owner of an article of little value, but, on the other hand, if the property found were worth several thousand dollars, the finder might reasonably be expected to expend his own money, if necessary, to locate the loser. If he didn't, he would be guilty of larceny under the statute.

There is no duty upon the part of the finder to advertise for the owner unless that method seems to be the most likely one to locate him.

If you find a gold watch on a street car it is your duty to turn it over to the conductor or to the lost property department of the railway company, not because the company has a better title to it than you, but because that is the most likely method of locating the owner. If the property is not reclaimed within a reasonable time, you may insist upon having it returned to you. For this reason, when you turn over lost property in this way either obtain a receipt for it admitting your claim to it as a finder, or if you cannot obtain such a receipt, deliver with the article a letter asserting your claim, keeping a copy of the letter.

Again, if you find a pocketbook in a store, and there is no clue to its owner, it is your duty to inform the shopkeeper of your find, but there is no reason why you should turn it over to him unless by so doing the owner may be more easily found.

Articles found in the public highway may be turned over to the nearest police station, but in most cases it would suffice simply to notify the police authorities of your find.

Will the "DASHEEN" Replace POTATOES?

THE dasheen is not a new vegetable, because it has been known and used in Japan and China for thousands of years, but in this country it is practically "new" to the people, since it was introduced here not very long ago, and even then it is known to only a few people.

That a vegetable which makes such an excellent substitute for the Irish potato should have a name like "dasheen" it would seem as though it were an Irish vegetable, for the name certainly sounds "Irish;" but it is far from that, being an Oriental name. It is also cultivated in the West Indies, Central and South America, parts of Africa and Malaysia. But it is only recently that it has been grown in the South, and experiments are being made with it by the United States Agricultural Department.

To grow the dasheen a particular soil is needed. It cannot be grown to great advantage in the sections where the Summer seasons is short, as in Canada, but it is believed it would succeed in most parts of the United States. The Trinidad variety of the dasheen has been made to yield 400 bushels to the acre. A rich, wet soil is needed, with plenty of potash. The potash can be added if the proper soil otherwise is secured.

The dasheen is excellent cooked in as many ways as the potato may be served, perhaps in more. It can be boiled or baked, fried, mashed, made into croquets, and also used as a stuffing for fowl and meat. It is said to contain more nutriment than the potato, having from 40 to 70 per cent more protein or nitrogenous substances. It has an added advantage in that it does not taste like the pototo. It would not add much were it to tasts like the potato, as people are always looking for new foods and new flavors. The dasheen has something of a flavor of boiled chestnuts.

The leaf is something like the leaves of marshy or water plants, being elephant-ear shape. The vegetable is a bulb or tuber and is planted much like the potato. It is harvested, however, with less labor, as the plants grow close together and one dasheen or tuber is at the end of the stalk. It is harvested by pulling up the stalk. Then it is allowed to dry on top of the ground, if possible. If there is too much rain it has to be dried elsewhere. It will keep six months, sometimes longer, if kept dry.

While it will probably never take the place of the potato, it will supply a new food, and because of its nature it will doubtless partly take the place of the potato, giving us two such vegetables instead of the one. Just how cheaply it may be grown is not known as yet, but the Government experimenters hope to learn all this within another season or so.

Tuber and Leaf of the Asiatic "Dasheen," Which May Prove a Valuable Substitute for the Potato.

The desirability of a vegetable that will at least partly take the potato's place is understood by all agriculturists, and by many housekeepers. Farmers are always seeking some new variety of potato that is hardier than the old ones—for unusually wet or unusually dry seasons always affect the crop seriously, sometimes to the extent of a potato famine.

The famous Burbank has done a great deal toward meeting this situation, the potato bearing his name having proved immune to many of the influences of weather and unfavorable soil which mean almost total crop failures of older varieties. Still, such is the popular dependance upon this tuber that the cultivation of an acceptable substitute would meet a real and widespread economic need.

It is well known that the failure of one potato crop in Ireland reduces thousands of the population to starvation's point. In this country a scarcity of potatoes, with prices increased three or four times above normal, adds a heavy burden to those borne by a majority of households, as few families now economize in the matter of potatoes any more than they do in the case of bread.

Why a Talking Machine Is One of the HARDEST Audiences to SING Before

IT is well known that the grand opera stars make a great deal of money singing into the talking machines of various concerns in order that these companies may manufacture the records for sale, but the fact that almost without exception a grand opera star would much rather sing before the most critical audience than before a talking machine is by no means generally known.

In the first place it is rather uncanny, standing in a big empty room before a mammoth horn protruding from between curtains, with the conductor away up high where he will not interrupt the sound waves, and the "orchestra" composed of weird looking instruments made especially for this work.

The singer stands on a little wooden platform at the mouth of the receiving trumpet.

A red light is flashed, and the queer little orchestra gets to work. Then at the crucial moment the artist has to sing to this strange little assembly with the same zest he would under the inspiration of brilliant lights, beautiful clothes, splendid settings and an applauding audience. It is an ordeal, because he has to sing with far greater care in front of the talking machine than is required when an audience is to be pleased. The slightest variations means a start-over, a slight clearing of the throat, a deep breath or slight shuffle of the feet—and the revolving discs record every one of these faults—and the record is spoiled. But these faults are all criticised by an experienced record-director, and it is his business to see that nothing short of the perfect records are produced—because from these first moulds are made all of the thousands of records that go into so many homes.

When the artist has finished the records is played over and the imperfections criticised. The weak spots are rehearsed, and the whole trying business commenced over again.

And so it is acknowledged by many of the theatrical and music-hall stars that to produce a record of pure and distinct tone is far harder than to make their way sucessfully through a whole operatic score. It is a tremendous task to get a set of the perfect records from the opera favorites. It has been said that Caruso has been forced to spend over four hours of untiring work before he was able to perfect his "Ridi Pagliacci" in the opera of "I Pagliacci," and in that time was forced to make over thirty fresh starts before a disc of pure and distinct tone was obtained.

AMERICA OVERRUN BY SAVAGE HORDES IN 1914?

The Many Amazing Predictions of "The Nun of Viterbo," Which Have Come Strangely True, Capped by a Deathbed Prophecy of Incredible Disaster to the United States

"About the end of 1914 the yellow invaders will be throwing dice for the last American girl in Central Park, New York."

Rome, June 26.

"THE HOLY NUN OF VITERBO," Sister Maria Benedetta, who has just passed away, enjoyed a tremendous fame throughout Italy for her success in predicting coming events.

Her power was usually exercised with the object of averting misfortune from people or preparing them for inevitable disaster. Hundreds of people were enabled to escape from the Messina earthquake through her warning, and in many other cases her admonitions were timely. This gave her a great reputation for sanctity, and she was particularly beloved among the poor and simple peasants.

One of the most remarkable predictions ever made by the nun related to America and was uttered on her deathbed. The extraordinary and unquestioned accuracy of many of her previous predictions gives added interest to this very alarming statement. Are we to believe that the nun's mind was disordered by her last illness, or was her prophetic faculty sharpened by the near approach of death?

This is the terrifying statement which the dying nun is said to have made to visitors just before her death:

"Trouble is coming from the East. The Yellow Peril threatens the world, but it is against America that it will be first directed. Prepare to defend yourselves to the last gasp.

"Before two years are past—about the end of 1914—the yellow invaders will be throwing dice for the last American girl in Central Park, New York, amid the smoking ruins of the great city, given up to the idolatrous cult of the Golden Calf.

"But true-hearted Americans will make a brave stand for their race in the interest of their country. I see a great battle upon a vast plain by a great lake. I cannot see how it will end."

It must be admitted that this blood-curdling prediction hardly seems like an outpouring of holiness, yet if the nun, in her strange, psychic condition, saw such things about to happen, what could she do but utter them? Doubtless she felt it her duty to warn Americans. Her prediction has been widely published here and is implicitly believed by hundreds of thousands, probably by millions of people.

The nun's name was Maria Benedetta Frey. She was born in Rome in 1836 and brought up in a convent of the Cistercian nuns. At the age of twenty-one she refused an offer of marriage, and then, having shown a deeply religious bent of mind, joined the Cistercian Order. After two years of novitiate she became a professed nun and took up her residence at Viterbo, near Rome.

In 1861 she was stricken with paralysis of the spine, which kept her a helpless, suffering cripple for the rest of her life. It was after this attack that she developed the gift of prophecy. She lived for fifty-two years after her attack and her fame increased during all this time.

Sister Maria Benedetta spent more than half a century with her head tightly bandaged and supported by a steel frame fixed at both ends of her bed. She endured a continual martyrdom, but she never complained. Her nurse, who grew old by her bedside and died before her, said she never even heard her sigh.

People of all ranks crowded to her bedside for years to ask her help in time of trouble, or else out of curiosity to hear her remarkable prophecies.

The room in which the nun lived and suffered was as bare as a prison cell. Its only ornaments were a crucifix on the wall and a small image of the Saviour, which she kept near her bed and for which she had a special veneration. It is stated that when unbelievers went to see her out of curiosity, she would show them this image and a strange change would come over them.

The prediction that raised her fame to the highest pitch throughout Italy foretold the assassination of King Humbert at Monza, on July 29, 1890.

On July 29 the Mother Abbess of Sister Maria Benedetta's convent informed the sub-Prefect of Viterbo, a Government official, that the sister had had a vision of King Humbert's assassination. The official wired to Rome for information and received word that nothing had happened to the King. As a matter of fact, the officials in Rome had not then received news of the King's death. He was stabbed late in the afternoon by Gaetano Bresci, an anarchist, and died within an hour in the castle of Monza.

The extraordinary inquiry from Viterbo gave rise to the belief that the plot against the King must have been hatched there, but investigation showed that there was no ground for this. Bresci plotted the King's assassination in Paterson, New Jersey. The widowed Queen Margherita soon afterward visited the nun and was greatly impressed by her gifts of second sight and prophecy. The Queen became one of her stanchest believers and helped to spread her fame throughout Europe.

Ten years ago the Pope allowed the nun to receive visitors in her room, thus relaxing the rule of the Cistercian Order that strangers can speak to the nuns only through an iron grating.

At the time the revolutionary disturbances were acute in Russia, the nun told Queen Margherita that her friend, the Grand Duchess Sergius of Russia, should never let her husband go alone in public, or he would be killed. The Grand Duchess followed her warning carefully and, although the Grand Duke was the most hated of all the Russian rulers, he went unharmed for many months.

On February 4, 1905, the nun said:

"Tell the Russian Grand Duchess that her husband is in great peril to-day."

The warning came too late, for on that day the Grand Duke Sergius, who treated his wife with great harshness, went out without her, in spite of her warnings, and was blown to shreds by Nihilist bombs.

Warnings were repeatedly sent from the nun to King Alfonso of Spain telling him to be on his guard against assassins and revolutionaries. A timely message was sent to him the day before his wedding, and this is said to have enabled him to escape the murderous attack which killed so many of his suite and subjects on that day.

The King always paid respectful heed to the warnings, and, although he never ran away from danger, it is stated that being on his guard enabled him to make the slight movement needed to put him beyond danger on many desperate occasions.

The nun warned King Carlos of Portugal that a plot was being formed against him, but the stout, jovial monarch replied:

"Thanks, very much; but I can take care of myself."

The King, who was killed with his son on February 1, 1908, was a first cousin of the King of Italy. His mother, who was a sister of the late King Humbert, was deeply impressed by the nun's message, but failed to produce any effect on her son.

The forecasts and warnings of the nun at the time of the dreadful Messina earthquake did more than anything else to make her beloved by the common people. On December 27, 1908, she spoke more impressively and tragically than she had ever done before, saying:

"Woe to the people of Sicily. A dreadful catastrophe is coming to them. It will be worse than anything they have known in their long tragic history. Woe to Messina! The beautiful city will be destroyed. I see death, devastation, famine, pestilence everywhere. Tell the poor people to fly while there is yet time. Let them leave everything they possess and save their lives."

The nun had by that time a great reputation, and her warning, which came the day before the disaster, was serviceable in inducing many hundreds to escape or else to make timely preparations to leave the doomed area.

Another prediction which made the nun a venerated character throughout Italy related to the war with Turkey. A party of young recruits, ordered to join the colors long before war had been decided on, visited the nun to ask her blessing. To them she said:

"A war is coming. I see scenes of bloodshed and agony on burning, sandy plains. But it will be a glorious war. It will be the first glorious war in which Italy has fought. It will be a war of the Cross against the Crescent, and the Cross will be victorious. Some of you will never return, but do not be afraid, for you will meet a death that will be better than years of sordid misery and labor. Fight bravely and do not shrink from death. He that tries hardest to lose his life shall keep it.

"For you, young man (here the nun turned her eyes on a very handsome young soldier), I see a splendid military career and a long and happy life."

When the war actually broke out her popularity became enormous. She was constantly visited by soldiers going to the war and by the mothers, wives and relatives of those who had gone.

The mothers and wives of the soldiers usually asked the nun to pray for her loved ones. She would ask for the names of the soldiers for whom she was requested to pray, and after thinking a while replied, either bidding her visitor to hope or gently suggesting that the soldier would fall gloriously in the fight for his country and his faith.

It is declared that she never made a single mistake, and thousands of persons are ready to give evidence that whenever she told them to hope, their sons, husbands and relatives at the post were not killed.

The nun's answer to ill-judged requests for information about the future frequently had a character of dry humor. During the famous Camorra trial, Don Ciro Vitozzi, who was particularly forceful and dramatic in protesting his innocence, sent to ask her if he would be acquitted. She sent back this message:

"If you are innocent, you will certainly be acquitted."

The Nun's mind and supposed powers of second-sight tended to deal principally with death, war, disasters and tragic ocurrences. She is credited with having foretold the Franco-German war of 1870, the entry of the Italian army into Rome, which occurred in the same year, the assassination of President Carnot of France and the Empress Elizabeth of Austria, the deaths of the Emperor Frederick of Germany and of King Edward of England, the Titanic disaster and many other tragedies of world-wide interest.

It is widely believed that she has foretold further disasters to the Italian royal family as a punishment for keeping the Pope out of his temporal possessions in Rome. Much secrecy is maintained upon this point, but she is said to have sent the following message to the Dowager Queen Margherita:

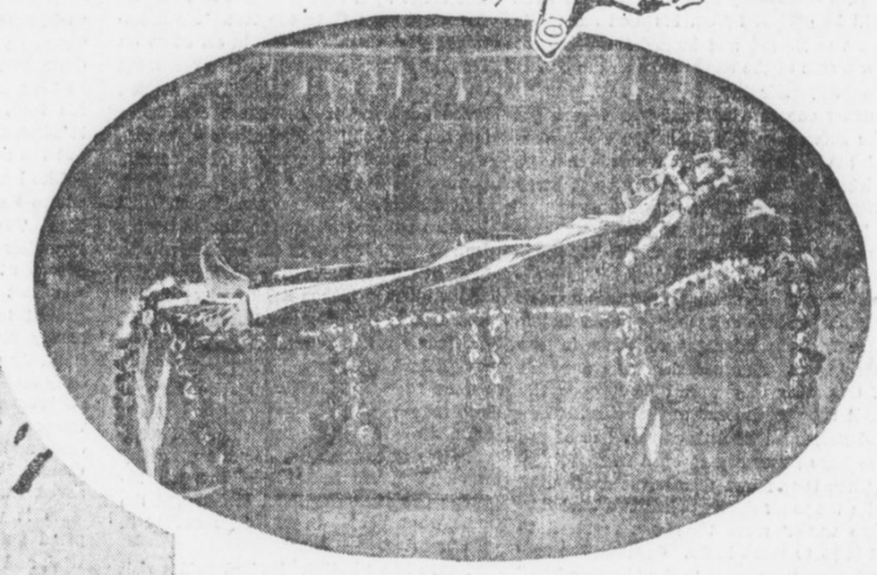
"As long as the House of Savoy rules in Rome, death and disaster will attend it. Remove the throne to another city and new glory will crown your house."

The nun predicted her own death a week ahead. On the morning of the day she had fixed, she called the Abbess and the other nuns to her cell and begged their forgiveness. She passed away at the very hour she had foretold.

The room in which she died was left exactly as she had used it and was sealed up by order of the Bishop of Viterbo. Every article left by the nun will be carefully preserved for the veneration of this and future generations.

Scientific men are greatly interested in the nun's case. While not ready to accept every feat attributed to her, they are inclined to believe that she possessed supernormal psychical powers. Her nervous system was in an entirely abnormal condition. Many of her nervous centres, which would have been used in a normal existence, were destroyed by the disease that afflicted her and it is conceivable that the remaining nervous centres had developed powers not possessed by those of ordinary persons. Her sense of hearing, for instance, was acute to an almost incredible degree.

Those who take this view think that the disturbance of the earth caused by the Messina earthquake, several hundred miles away, may have been perceptible to her. The other cases are, of course, more difficult to explain, but it is suggested that she learned much from the actions of those who came to make inquiries of her.



Sister Maria Benedetta, the Nun of Viterbo, as She Appeared When Lying in Death and Viewed by Many Thousands of Italians Who Venerated Her Prophetic Power.

"The Nun sent word to the Grand Duchess Sergius that her husband would be killed if he went in public without her. He disobeyed the warning and was assassinated February 4, 1905."

"A dreadful catastrophe is coming to Sicily. Woe to you people of Messina! Flee for your lives!' The Nun's warning the day before the Messina earthquake is said to have been the means of saving hundreds of lives."

WHY CRIME DOES NOT PAY--

No. 14 of a Series of Remarkable Revelations by Sophie Lyons, "QUEEN OF THE BURGLARS"

SOPHIE LYONS.

Langdon W. Moore, the Master Burglar, Who Stole More Than $2,000,000, but Died Penniless.

Copyright, 1913, by the Star Company.

LANGDON W. MOORE, alias Charley Adams, one of the cleverest bank burglars in the criminal history of this country, cleared over $2,000,000 in the course of his long criminal career. He died two or three years ago at the age of eighty without a cent to his name.

This fact in itself might not warrant the conclusion that a life of crime is not worth while, but when Moore's career is taken as a whole, no better example of the proposition that crime does not pay could possibly be presented.

I knew him well. He often spoke to me of his exploits, giving me the inside story of many of his deeds upon which the police had been unable to shed any light whatever. Long before he died, Moore was thoroughly convinced of the futility of a criminal career. "What a mess of it all I have made!" was a frequent exclamation of his.

For over fifty years, Moore was perhaps the most conspicuous figure in the underworld. During that time he pulled off some of the biggest and most daring bank burglaries ever perpetrated in this country. He was a mechanical genius and complete master of his trade. He was a brainier man than many of the presidents of the banks he robbed, and his code of honor was in many respects more commendable than that of judges who sent him to jail. He was feared by every bank and respected by every police official in the country.

Inspector Byrnes declared that Moore's understanding of the mechanism of safes was so complete that he was able to open them from the sound emitted by the spindle!

This may or may not have been so, but it is certainly true that Moore knew more about the weak points of locks and safes than any man who ever lived, and that when he matched his brains against those of the safe designers he invariably proved that he was their master.

Time and time again Moore got the best of safes which the manufacturers and other safe-crackers had declared to be impregnable. In one case, indeed, after two different gangs of safe-crackers had attempted to break into a bank safe in vain, the bank officials were so confident that the box was proof against burglars that they offered to allow any safe-cracker who cared to apply to take the safe to the top of a mountain and experiment there with it to his heart's content for four days. Moore didn't avail himself of this offer but he did make an attempt on the safe without the knowledge of the bank officials, and in just one hour and forty-five minutes had solved the problem so effectively that he was able to make off with the $60,000 the safe had contained!

Moore's biggest burglary was the robbery of the Concord National Bank of Concord, Mass. This remarkable piece of work, committed in broad daylight, netted him $310,000.

There has been considerable misapprehension regarding the manner in which this theft was pulled off. Even Inspector Byrnes seemed to have been misled by the erroneous stories which were circulated regarding it.

Thus it had been commonly stated that Moore was able to get into the safe because of the carelessness of the bank cashier, who had left the dial combination, marked in lead pencil, on the side of the vault, where all who ran might have read.

Apart from the inherent improbability of such a story, Moore told me the slightest investigation would have revealed that it was impossible. The safe was not a combination safe at all! The vault doors were fitted with English ward locks.

Then, too, it has been said that this clever robbery was planned quite suddenly by Moore and his pal, Harry Howard, otherwise known as "English Harry," another notorious safe-cracker. As a matter of fact, Moore worked industriously for five months in preparation for it before he was ready to turn the trick.

Moore had planned to rob the bank at Francestown, N. H. On thinking the matter over however, he regretted his decision because he had been born and brought up near the town, and he did not feel like robbing his old neighbors. Very cleverly, Moore contrived to prevent the robbery without acquainting his pals with the fact that he had changed his mind regarding it.

It was while returning from this incompleted job that Moore conceived the idea of robbing the Concord banks. Two of them, the Concord National and the Middlesex Institution for Savings occupied the same building.

This building was directly opposite the hotel where Moore happened to stop for lunch, and while he was eating he observed the cashier returning to the bank from his dinner. The cashier unlocked the street door and left the key in the lock. Moore hastily finished his meal and stepped over to the bank.

He followed the cashier upstairs and saw him unlock the outer and inner doors of the vault and also the door to the "burglar box" inside. To justify his presence in the bank, Moore presented a hundred-dollar bill to the cashier and asked to have it changed.

During the few moments that he was in the bank Moore had obtained a very good idea of the problem which confronted him. He observed that the lock to the street door was of a very simple style which could be easily overcome. Moore concluded that the "job" was worth while.

"Just as the burglar was closing the bank door, he heard a child's voice exclaim: "Let me in!" She said she desired to see the cashier. The burglar promptly replied that the cashier was attending a directors' conference, and the child, quite unsuspicious, left the bank. In a few minutes the funds of the bank, amounting to $310,000 lay at the burglar's mercy!"

He went to New York and secured the cooperation of Harry Howard, who returned with him to his farm at Natick. Wax impressions of the key of the street door were taken and the blank keys cut to fit the impression, but effort after effort, covering a period of several weeks in this direction, proved futile. The finished keys were tried at midnight and they failed to fit.

Then the burglars succeeded in making an entry by one of the windows. Howard made his way to the door and unscrewed some of the nuts which held the locks in place with the idea of removing the lock and studying its mechanism.

In doing this, however, he knocked off some of the varnish around the bolt head, and Moore ordered him to desist, fearing that if any more varnish fell off it might attract attention in the morning and bring about an investigation. The nuts were replaced and the burglars gave up their work for the night.

Some nights later they appeared again on the scene. This time they plugged the lock in a way which would arouse no suspicion as to the manner in which it had become stopped up. The sole object of this move was to necessitate the removal of the lock by a locksmith, Moore figuring that in doing the job the locksmith would inevitably knock off the paint and varnish from the bolt heads and thus enable him and his pal to work on the lock afterward without leaving any telltale marks.

The plan worked out exactly as Moore had figured, and some nights later Howard gained entrance to the bank by way of the window, made his way to the door, unscrewed the bolts, removed the lock and found out why it was that their keys had failed to work. A few minutes' work with a file was sufficient to make the lock respond to their keys, and then it was replaced.

There was another door at the top of the stairs, but the lock was easily overcome. The burglars then studied the vault itself. It had five different keyholes.

How thoroughly Moore went at his work will be gathered from his next step. He went to Boston and hunted the city over for a safe of the same make as the one at Concord. His industry was rewarded by finding one at a safemaker's. Moore got the safemaker to explain the mechanism of the safe to him, pretended that he wished to buy it, but finally went away without purchasing it.

The burglars' visits to the bank continued. They were now able to let themselves in by the front door. They appeared upon the scene three times a week for six weeks, and they worked industriously from midnight to three in the morning on each occasion. As a result of this labor they were able to open the vault door by the end of that time. They had succeeded in fitting every one of the five keys necessary to open it.

Then they found themselves confronted with the inner door. It had two keyholes. Two weeks' more time was required to fit keys to these locks. Opening the second door, they came to the "burglar box." Moore found that one of the two locks on this box was of such a character that fitting a key to it was out of the question, and it would be necessary to blow it open.

Moore paid numerous visits to the bank in the daytime in order to get further information which might prove valuable to him, purchasing notes as a pretext for his presence there. On one of the visits he observed that the cashier did not place in his pocket the key which the burglars had found themselves unable to fit, but laid it on a shelf in the vault. With this key in their possession it would be unnecessary for them to blow the box.

Some days later Moore decided the time had arrived to "turn the trick."

He and Howard drove into town. Moore stayed in the vicinity of the bank. When the cashier left the bank for his lunch Howard drove down to a grocery store almost opposite the bank, where he was to act as lookout. Then Moore walked boldly to the bank and let himself in with the key he had made.

Just as the burglar was closing the door he heard a child's voice exclaim: Let me in!" and the child had followed so closely upon his heels that he couldn't have closed the door without forcibly putting the child outside.

Moore was unusually quick-witted. He realized that if the child's suspicions were aroused she might alarm the town. He asked her what she wanted, and when she said she desired to see the cashier the burglar promptly replied that the cashier was attending a director's conference, but that if she same back in an hour she could see him.

Quite unsuspicious, the child left the bank, and Moore bolted the door behind her. Making his way to the vault, the burglar found everything as he had expected, and in a very few minutes the funds of the bank lay at his mercy. Coolly he transferred the bonds, notes and bills to a mealsack which he carried for the purpose, and then confiscating the key which opened the bolts after they had been unlocked and which the cashier had left in its keyhole, he closed the doors of the safe and made his way out of the bank.

Without any undue haste the burglars made a safe getaway. Although Moore was subsequently arrested for this crime, he was able to make a deal by which he secured his freedom in consideration of his restoring some two hundred thousand dollars' worth of the booty to the bank.

At this time there was a type of safe which was thought to be burglar-proof. It was made by a man named Lillie. Moore decided to put it to the test. He ascertained that there was one in an office on Staten Island, and desired to experiment upon it. With the aid of a specially devised brace he found it possible to drill holes into the solid chilled steel of which the safe was composed and a few ounces of rifle powder did the rest.

As a result of this success, "Dutch Dan," Moore's pal, prevailed upon him to try his luck at another safe of the same type at a bank at Olean, N. Y. The doors were two and a quarter inches thick and of chilled iron cast in one piece. "Dutch Dan" had previously taken several other safe-crackers to look the ground over, but all had agreed that the job couldn't be done in less than six hours, and as there was a hotel directly opposite which didn't close till after midnight, they decided that they wouldn't have time to do the job between the time the hotel closed and the time when people began to go abroad in the morning.

Moore knew better. He had paid a visit to the Lillie works and knew exactly how the safe was constructed. He was confident that he could get the best of it in two hours.

It was this safe which, as I have previously mentioned, the directors considered so safe that they offered to let any safe-cracker have it to himself on the top of a mountain for four days. This offer Moore felt it unnecessary to accept.

Securing the services of a third man to act as lookout and to provide a rig for the getting away, Moore and 'Dutch Dan" descended upon the bank one dark night and succeeded in breaking into the "burglar-proof" safe in just forty-five minutes.

Moore came to grief first through the treachery of one of his accomplices. He had been engaged by other burglars for a bank job at Rockland, Maine. An ex-city marshal and a big merchant of the city were said to be interested in the plot, and Moore consented to do the work.

The ex-marshal, a man named Kaiser, and his friends were to furnish the necessary teams. Against his better judgment, which led him to distrust several of those interested in the plot, particularly the ex-marshal and his friends, Moore went through with the job. A premature explosion opened the safe, but nearly wrecked the building. Across the street the burglars saw the night watchman and a porter staring awe-stricken at the bank.

Moore quickly decided that the burglars' only chance was to secure the funds and to buy off those interested in prosecuting them, as he had been able to do in the Concord robbery. Putting a wet sponge in his mouth and a wet handkerchief over his face, he made his way through the blinding and suffocating smoke and cleaned out the safe in the darkness.

The burglars then proceeded to the spot where Kaiser was to meet them with the rigs. They had to wait several hours before Kaiser appeared, and from his manner Moore at once surmised that everything was not exactly right. His suspicions proved to be well-founded, for they had hardly gone half a mile when they were suddenly surrounded by a posse of fifty or sixty men armed with rifles, blunderbusses, pitchforks and every other conceivable weapon. The burglars were roughly handled, and the crowd made ready to lynch them. It was only Moore's tact which saved them.

As it was, Moore found it prudent to plead guilty when his case came up for trial, and he was sentenced to seven years in the Maine State Prison.

He served six and a half, during which time he suffered privations of the most dreadful character.

His first three years of prison life passed without incident. Although his wife came to see him regularly during that period, she was never allowed to speak to Moore in private. Moore got an idea that, if properly managed, a campaign to secure his pardon might prove successful. He figured that a fund of $2,500 would be needed for the purpose.

Because the warden was always present when his wife visited him and his correspondence was always censored, the only way he could communicate his plan to his wife was by a subterfuge. In writing to his wife, he wrote twenty words on the envelope and covered them with the stamp. It took him several months to impart his whole plan to his wife by this installment plan, but at the end of that time, she was in full possession of her husband's ideas on the subject. She at once proceeded to raise the money and then unwisely wrote on the margin of a New York newspaper which she was privileged to send her husband, the words "All right. I will be there the second week in March."

This message was intercepted by the warden. He subjected Mrs. Moore to the most rigid examination, but she would not admit that she had been in secret communication with her husband. Moore was then put through a similar ordeal, but he denied having communicated with his wife in any way and professed to know nothing about the message on the newspaper.

The warden was greatly incensed, and, by way of punishment, ordered that Moore should no longer enjoy the privileges which had previously been accorded to him. He was allowed neither to see or write to his wife. He was no longer permitted to purchase food or other articles. When the clothing his wife had purchased for him wore out, he was not allowed to renew it. The warden told him that he would be restored to his former privileges only when he revealed the manner in which he had communicated with his wife and apologized for having done so. Moore was too obstinate to yield, and for the next three years suffered the greatest physical and mental torture in consequence.

His clothing was reduced to tatters. For days at a time he was unable to eat the coarse prison food. No martyr ever suffered greater agonies than this remarkable convict during this period.

Nevertheless, when Moore was finally released, he was a more confirmed enemy to society than before. He continued his operations against the banks of the country, but was finally caught and sentenced to cumulative penalties aggregating fifteen years.

It was not until after he had completed that term that he really saw the error of his ways. Then he tried to lead an honest life, but found it impossible to accumulate any wealth, and all his ill-gotten gains had long ago been dissipated in futile attempts to secure his freedom.

He died in 1910. He was eighty years old. He had been fighting society for over fifty years, and although considered in the underworld as a "successful" criminal, he knew himself that his life had been a failure.

"I have learned from hard experience," he wrote shortly before he died, "that money obtained by fraud is at a discount and will not purchase peace, comfort and a contented mind. If any young man starting out in life thinks he can make a success of crime, he will discover, perhaps when too late, that his life has been a failure!"

Langdon W. Moore's testimony that CRIME DOES NOT PAY is worth heeding.

SOPHIE LYONS.

How Worry Really Kills You

WE have often heard that worry can kill even the nine-lived cat, but we have only half believed it, and until now we have had no scientific proof that it was so.

Medical science has recently confirmed the fact and explained how worry commits its murders. It has reached the conclusion that in many instances of what have been regarded as lunacy, and from which the victim finally dies, the case has simply been one of acute worry. Instead of the person dying of mental breakdown, he has worried himself to death.

Worry medical science now defines as the dominance of one idea, usually that of fear. There is a fear of some existing condition or dread of what may happen. The idea crowds all others from the mind, or permits them only the feeblest and occasional activity.

This one idea pounds, hammer-like, upon one set of brain cells. It overstimulates them, causing an unusual flow of blood to those portions and a dearth of it to other parts of the brain.

This would not be serious if it happened only now and then, for every brain cell should be replenished by more than the usual flow of blood at times to keep it properly fed and nourished.

But a constant overfeeding of these cells causes a congestion there. The cells become more and more distended. The worry grows more and more acute. The pounding of the blood against the sides of the cells acquires a hammerlike violence. The sides of the cells wear thin. A cell bursts. There is a so-called "clot on the brain." Death follows.

The cure of the worry that kills is prevention. Refuse to worry. Do your best, and, having done this, decline as positively to fret about the results as you would decline to drink a draught of poison. Worry comes as an occasional visitant to everyone, but as we shut our doors to unwelcome visitors, so we close the portals against the entrance of worry. Admitted, it ceases to be a visitor—it is a habit, and a habit that destroys. The action of worry upon the brain cells is most like the constant dropping of water upon a stone. At first it makes not the slightest impression upon the stone, but in time it wears it away. The cells of the brain are of more delicate tissue, and the steady wear and tear of the extra blood supply in time quickly wears them out.

Or, according to medical science, it is as though a garment worn day after day without change soon falls into tatters. Examinations of the brain after death have shown a group of nerve cells at the crown of the head that have perished in the same way the nerve of a tooth dies. While every other brain cell seems to be in ordinary condition this group has shrunken. It is a curious coincidence, and science says a consequence, as inevitable as effect after cause, that the hair on the portion of the scalp just above this brain area is the first to grow white. Heat in the scalp causes hair to grow gray, and an excess of blood in any portion of the brain causes the scalp above that portion to be overheated.

Bow Wow-Wow!

Mrs. August Belmont. Her Displeasure at Having a Show Girl for a Daughter-in-Law Is Made All the Keener by the Repeated Triumphs of Mrs. Raymond Belmont's Dogs at the Bench Shows.

WHEN Mrs. Raymond Belmont, the former Winter Garden show girl, bought Pansy, her $500 Pekinese toy dog, did she plan to be most exquisitely revenged on the members of her husband's family? Was it malice aforethought that guided her? Or did it just happen? Mrs. Raymond will not tell, but the various members of the Belmont family are sure that the former Ethel Lorraine, one-time chorus lady, has turned dog fancier just to spite them. And now no one dares say bow-wow whenever any of the Belmonts are near by.

And why should not this young woman buy dogs and travel about the country showing them?

Because the Belmonts have always shown their dogs and attended all the shows in this part of the country, and they can not do so any longer, because everywhere they go they bump into their new relations-in-law.

Simple, is it not? But very painful.

You see, in the beginning, the Belmont family did not acknowledge the existence of Mrs. Raymond; they even denied that Raymond, the second son of the multi-millionaire and banker, ever did marry any one, and even if he did, it was not Ethel Lorraine.

The air was filled with denials the day after the marriage was reported. The Belmonts denied that the wedding had occurred, Mrs. Raymond denied that the marriage had not occurred. At that time Pansy, the Pekinese, did not deny anything, because she had not been added to the family. She was an afterthought, so to speak.

But the Belmonts speedily found that their denials did them no good. The marriage had taken place over in Hoboken, and Ethel Lorraine had the paper to prove it.

In the beginning the family of the foolish young husband refused to consider that the young wife had any claim on them. They went on their way exhibiting their dogs, and their dogs went on bow-wowing and the bride wept at home, neglected and forlorn.

Now the Belmonts say that while the bride moped at home she was busy thinking and planning how she could bring her husband and his family to terms and to make them at least acknowledge her physical existence.

Here is the picture the Belmonts draw of the young wife. Here is what they say she was thinking.

"Brrrh, Brrrh, but I will be revenged on Raymond's family. I will bring them to terms. But how, oh, how shall I do it? Shall I go to Newport? No, I have not money enough, and then I simply could not stand being lorgnetted at by those Casino dames. But revenged I will be."

At this moment Mrs. Raymond stopped her tears long enough to read about the Toy Dog Show at the Waldorf, where the Belmonts were exhibiting their pets and winning prizes, and where August Belmont was the over-lord, so to speak.

And then a dog outside her window began to bark, and all at once the inspiration struck the ex-showgirl.

"Bow-wow, she cried, bow-wow-wow, I have found my revenge. I will buy a dog and exhibit her and win all the blue ribbons for myself."

And straightway it was done. Mrs. Raymond Belmont's name appeared in the list of entrants at the very next show held at Mineola as the owner and exhibitor of Pansy, a Pekinese toy, worth $500, and warranted to take at least two blue ribbons at every show.

The first day's session of the Dog Show at Mineola was a busy period; there were hundreds of dogs to be exhibited. Mrs. Raymond arrived early, so as to be on hand when her neglectful-in-laws should arrive.

"Bow-wow" yapped Pansy, "what are you doing here in this horrid place with all these dogs?"

"S-s-s-h, we are waiting to see our father-in-law and stepmother-in-law," answered her loving mistress.

Raymond Belmont Who Started All the Trouble by Marrying Ethel Lorraine.

Miss Barbara Rutherfurd, Whose Admiration for Dogs Can Hardly Be Expected to Include Mrs. Raymond Belmont's Prize Winners.

But young Mrs. Raymond's revenge was only too complete. The Belmonts already knew that her name was on the exhibitor's list, and, of course, they withdrew their dogs and stayed at home. This was particularly hard on the Augie Belmonts, for they had some perfectly lovely Pekinese pups that they knew would sweep all before them. But young Mrs. Belmont, who was a very haughty young beauty before she married August, junior, utterly refused to run the risk of meeting her new sister-in-law, and she did not even want her pups to meet the new Pansy.

"But," said Mrs. Augie to her father-in-law, whose word in his own family has always been law, "but she is only doing this to tease us temporarily, or perhaps she does not know how it does tease us. She will not go to any of the other shows I am sure."

But she did. The effect of her presence at Mineola pleased her so much that Mrs. Raymond decided to follow the dog circu't and show her dog all over the country.

An underground current took this sad information to the Belmonts.

"Bow-wow-wow," barked the big dogs in the Belmont kennels, and "bow-wow-wow" yapped the little dogs in the same kennels, "why are we not being sent to the shows, why are we not winning any more beautiful blue ribbons?"

This bow-wowing was heard up at the house where the Belmont family was in consultation.

"Can you not do something?" asked Mrs. Belmont of her powerful husband, 'can you not keep this Pansy from being shown?"

But such a course was impossible under the laws of the American Kennel Association. Any dog whose points were correct and whose owner fulfilled certain conditions must be admitted to the bench. Therefore Pansy could bow-wow to her heart's content at every bench show in the country and none could say her nay.

From New York Pansy was taken to Boston, and there won another blue ribbon, but the effect on the Belmont family was electrical. And society itself took up the cudgels for the much-tried family.

"Let us freeze Pansy out," said society, "let us make her realize that she belongs in another class."

But the judges said "no, no, Pansy is a winner and cannot be ignored, even if she does send the Belmonts from the field."

Society, however, took its revenge on Pansy's owner by not noticing her or her dog at all. It was as though neither dog nor mistress existed.

"I am being revenged, however," was Mrs. Raymond's daily thought, and it was a great comfort to her, indeed. Revenge is ever sweet.

But not until recently did Mrs. Raymond realize the real depth and exquisiteness of her revenge. Not until she learned that her marriage has interfered with the pet dream of her father-in-law's heart, that Raymond should marry the younger daughter of Mrs. William K. Vanderbilt, Miss Barbara Rutherfurd, also a lover of Pekinese dogs.

Oh, the double-barreled revenge! Just at the time that Mrs. Raymond was planning her bow-wow revenge Miss Rutherfurd announced that she would enter her beautiful Tossie, a pure-blooded Pekinese, worth several thousand dollars, in the Mineola show, but she had to withdraw Tossie when she heard that Pansy was to be shown. It was bad enough to lose the men she had planned to marry, but it was worse to lose the chance to show her lovely Tossie, she said.

"Ah, but revenge is sweet," sang Mrs. Raymond when she heard it.

The Vanderbilts sailed for Europe and took Miss Barbara with them, and also Tossie, and they are still over there, bow-wow.

But Mrs. Raymond has not yet finished her revenge. She began it with Pansy, but she is adding to it with several other dogs. In the big Belmont kennels at Meadow Brook, L. I., are dogs of every degree and kind. There are sheep dogs, Irish terriers, Airedale terriers and bulldogs. A wonderful collection all bow-wowing and lamenting because they are never shown before admiring crowds any more.

To offset this collection, Mrs. Raymond recently decided to form a kennel of her own and sell pups to add to her income. She is gradually adding terriers and bulldogs to her string, and when her collection is complete there will be even more excitement in the Belmont kennels.

But stay, there is worse to come. It is whispered among the social friends and enemies of the Belmonts that the young wife has a further card up her sleeve, one that will be a body blow to her husband's family. She needs a home for her future kennels, and where else but on Long Island could she find a better place? There is a farm for sale adjacent to the Belmont estate, and unless Mr. Belmont beats her to it, young Mrs. Belmont intends to lease it with the privilege of buying it later.

"Bow-wow-wow," sigh the old-established dogs in the Belmont kennels. "What are we coming to? No more shows, no more blue ribbons, bow-wow-wow life is just one dog-goned thing after another."

Will it not be something too awful to think of if young Mrs. Belmont secures that farm next to her father-in-law's? What will happen should the ladies of the two households ever meet while exercising their pets?

Suppose one of the dogs gets lost? Will not the loser insist that her neighbor has it?" "Oh, where, oh, where, has my little dog gone," she will sing and send out a searcher to hunt through her neighbor's kennels.

There is no doubt that the advent of the new Mrs. Belmont will add to the gaiety of the Long Island season, bow-wow. And for once in his life August Belmont, Esq., finds that his millions are of no avail.

How can millions affect a dog, or several dogs, anyway?

"Bow-wow-wow, am I not being sweetly revenged?" asks Mrs. Raymond Belmont, and from Miss Rutherfurd over in Paris and from all the Belmont family comes the answer: "Yes."

The Diary a Doctor Kept While Dying

PROBABLY the strangest, most affecting diary ever written was that found at the bedside of the late Dr. George Henry Roque Dabbs, who died recently in London of that form of heart disease called angina pectoris, which is accompanied by intense pain involving the whole left side and arm. Dr. Dobbs, a distinguished physician, sixty-seven years old at the time of his death, attended Tennyson during the poet's last illness.

Here is the diary of death, written on the backs of envelopes, and entitled, "My Case":

"June 5, 8 p. m.—I think this experience may perhaps explain what must some day happen. It was not wise to walk up-stairs on a full stomach. . . . I should have waited. It is only my own fault—no one is to blame for the impatience of an old fool. Pain down left arm agonizing. Chloroform might relieve me.

"8:15.—Stopper stuck." (The Coroner said the writing was rather tremulous, as if the writer were excited.) "Crawled to kitchen.

"8:30.—Moved it at last. Telephone operator has begun a new chapter, evidently." (This, observed the Coroner, looked as if some one had been ringing him up, or the operator, as usual, had given the wrong number.) "Pain a little better.

"12:10.—Pain quenched for quite two and a half hours. Coming back again. In spite of my promise to Mrs. —— shall take more chloroform, but I am bound to stop it, or it will stop me.

"8:45 a. m.—Pain conquered, I think. Have just telephoned for more chloroform. Cannot be without it.

"6 p. m., Friday, 6th.—Just had a clutch at my heart again. Was talking to dear Adelaide (his octogenarian friend), and had recited her my last poem from the W. G. Well, I won't funk, and even if I die in her dear arms she will forgive me; but perhaps it will pass.

"June 6.—Continue diary. Rest of story in my bag.

"10:25 p. m.—Some pain—a little chloroform.

"June 7.—Must rest. Want some good professional advice. Very ill.

"6 p. m., June 7.—Got some more chloroform. It is safer for me than morphia, which I have not touched.

"Saturday, 8:50.—A kind friend has given me a little dinner. I was only there an hour and five minutes. Her kindness ought not to be rewarded by her name being mentioned if, as seems probable, my trouble comes on in the night.

"Sunday, June 8.—Bad night. Oh, the humiliations of disease! Shall keep quiet all day, and die like a stag if I may be alone. I have avoided morphia hitherto, but the pain is too much, and chloroform is like milk to me. I do so want to live. The world is so full of light, and life and interest. Jack Seely will do if he will only remember his own explanations, but will he? If Winston had been in Opposition now he would have been Prime Minister in six months. My love to all at the office, and I hope they will appreciate my partner, who is of sound opinions."

The Coroner said the diary was evidently a record of sensations extending over two or three days. On another table by the side of the bed, said the Coroner, what was evidently a last attempt by Dr. Dabbs to express himself was found, but it was very indistinct and scrawly. It seemed to read:

"Be kind to Simpson (his partner). I am dying. Thank you for all your kindness. To be continued in my next"——

"Be kind to my partner. I am passing. Can I keep awake till they find me—they find me—they find me? I must"——

NATURE'S CRUELEST MISTAKES—TO BE CORRECTED AT LAST!

By Operating Upon a Little Gland at the Brain's Base, Surgeons Expect to Keep People from Growing too High and too Fat---Like the 15-Year-Old Boy Who Has Reached 6 Feet 7 Inches

WHEN a boy of fifteen is six feet and seven inches tall and still growing, that is evidence of one type of mistake which Nature makes and which physicians and surgeons are exerting themselves to rectify. Of the same type of mistake is the previously normal man or woman who suddenly becomes inordinately fat and keeps getting fatter.

In neither case, apparently, has the victim done anything, eaten or drunk anything, or changed his habits in any way that might account for the uncomfortable, really dangerous, phenomenon. Plainly Nature has made a mistake, and there is no telling where it will stop.

Comparatively recently medical science has gained a clue to the particular "loose screw" in the human mechanism which turns Nature off the beaten track in this particular way. That clue lies in the condition of the little ductless gland at the base of the brain called the hypophysis, or pituitary body. It has been discovered that when this little gland—no larger than the tip of your little finger—is diseased or compressed by a tumor, unaccountable disturbances are set up in the rest of the human machine so afflicted. Post-mortem examinations of giants and abnormally fat persons have nearly always disclosed a diseased or compressed condition of the pituitary body.

Surgical experiments have shown that a restoration of the natural functions of this little gland have the effect of limiting the serious results referred to. Now, with the prospect of more conclusive results than have yet been obtained, surgeons at the Medico-Chirurgical Hospital in Philadelphia, are about to operate on the brain of John Mitchell—the fifteen-year-old boy above referred to. Thus they hope to "nip in the bud" a youthful case of giantism, and stop the growth of John Mitchell at his present more than respectable height of six feet and seven inches.

If this operation is successful in producing that result, the more than suspected unique mechanical function of the pituitary body—which exists in the brain of all vertebrate animals, including man—will be practically proved.

With medical men it is already more than a mere theory that this little gland exercises a control over all the organs of the body, stopping its growth at the point which we call normal, and preventing the laying on of abnormal quantities of fat. Its action can be compared to that of the "governor" of a steam engine, which automatically, with its whirling balls and valve attachment, regulates the inlet of steam according to the changing stress of work placed on the engine.

One can easily imagine the need, and therefore the existence, of such a controlling organ. Otherwise why should the average child's growth proceed gradually? Why should it terminate at the average age of maturity? Why should individuals of the same vertebrate species stop growing at practically the same age and size? Why don't they keep on growing while life lasts?

Nature is presumed to have made no mistake in fixing the neighborhood of six feet and about one hundred and seventy or eighty pounds as the proper height and weight of a mature man. We are accustomed to speak of persons who are much above or much below that height and that weight as "freaks." Giants are notoriously weak in the knees, usually with limbs ill-proportioned to their bodies, often with hands and feet too enormously large even for giants.

Other animals dwelling on land have a much larger uniform size, but support their weight upon four instead of two legs. Whales reach an enormous growth before their pituitary gland stops it at maturity, but their huge bodies are immersed in an element which gives their huge bulk uniform support all over.

So it seems that Nature was logical in fixing a normal size for each species of living creatures. In this respect her only mistake seems to be in letting man's governing pituitary gland get out of order—whereupon he is in danger of growing indefinitely, and nearly always in a grotesque, out-of-proportion manner.

Scientists are now satisfied that the hypophysis, or pituitary body, is a ductless gland, one of those bodies which has the peculiar function of forming a secretion which is distributed in some way to the blood and has a powerful effect on the system. But the discovery that the hypophysis was responsible for great disturbances, bringing about abnormal growth of bones and tissue, came only after many post-mortem examinations of giants, when it was found that in all cases the hypophysis was enlarged, tumorous, or otherwise diseased.

When scientists became convinced of the direct connection between the hypophysis and gigantism, they began to devote special care to the study of this body, and they have found it in all vertebrates, even in the whale. It has been found that, small as it is, there are really two lobes to the hypophysis, the anterior or front lobe, being the pituitary gland proper, and the posterior lobe, largely made up of fibres. The cells of the gland proper, the front part, secrete a peculiar liquid called thaon, which is discharged directly into the blood stream. It is held that the back lobe discharges its secretion directly into the cerebro-spinal fluid, thus reaching a vital spot immediately. The facts that its extraordinarily well protected position, its presence in all vertebrates and persistence throughout life, its remarkably disposed and abundant blood supply, would of themselves be enough to stamp the hypophysis as an organ of vital importance, is the opinion of Dr. Harvey Cushing, the leading authority in the world on this subject.

Experiments upon animals have proved that the activity of the back-lobe of the hypophysis is essential to the taking up of carbohydrates by the system, and a diminution of this power leads to high tolerance of sugars, with the resultant accumulation of fat.

It has also been proven that in all cases of enormously tall men and women either the hypophysis was diseased or so pressed upon by tumors near it as to be interfered with in its proper functions.

There is the case of a child only three years old, who at two and a half years of age began to grow rapidly. In six months she grew to be twice the size of the normal three-year-old child; her waist measured 19 inches, her hips 20 inches. She died at this time, and the post-mortem showed an enormous tumor which had flattened out the hypophysis. This is supposed to be a case of rapid transition from an over to an under-active glandular condition.

Many cases are on record of children and adults, in all of which the abnormal development of bones or fat was due to a diseased condition of the hypophysis. As a result of the last few years' study, treatments for these cruel mistakes of nature and diseases of the most important gland in the body have been devised, which are saving many from becoming monstrositiles.

There are three lines of treatment being followed by the specialists who have taken up this branch of medicine and surgery. In some cases medicinal measures are taken, in others glandular extracts are administered and sometimes surgical operations are necessary.

In most cases surgery is resorted to as the surest method of ascertaining conditions and dealing with them radically. Surgeons have reasoned parallel to their treatment of other glandular troubles, and where they have found that the hypophysis was too active they have not hesitated to remove a part of the gland and thus restore the normal action of this body. This has been proven true by several operations upon patients, who have recovered from the operation, and been improved in every respect, the lengthening of the bones and taking on of adipose tissue stopping at once.

The position of the hypophysis makes it difficult to reach, but once the way has been opened to it, the tumorous portion may be removed or a part of the gland taken away to stop the abnormal growth.

This is precisely what will be done to John Michael in the hospital in Philadelphia. His is plainly a case of what the doctors call hypopituitarism, or over-activity of this mighty little gland. There is but one line of procedure possible. The suregons will make their way in to the base of the brain and remove a part of the hypophysis, so that it will cease feeding so much of its powerful secretion to John's blood, and he will then stop growing tall and become more normal, if all goes well.

He has a very good chance, too, for in twenty-nine cases operated on there were but four deaths, a remarkably small number considering the location of the gland and difficulty of reaching it. So the probability is that John will soon be well and though he will not shrink in height, he will not add to his growth and can avoid becoming a monstrosity.

But if these cases of extraordinary development, either in height or fat, are taken in hand promptly, recourse to the knife may not be necessary. It has been shown to be effective to give patients glandular extracts by which the excessive or defective action of the hypophysis can be regulated, if there is no tumor present. These extracts are made from the hypophyses of cattle or swine, under the most scientific conditions. This method has been demonstrated as effective in a number of cases, especially is one noted lately, in which the boy lost 15 per cent in weight and seemed regenerated mentally and physically only from the administration of the dried extracts of hypophyses.

The development of the monstrosity can be stopped at once if every one comprehends that the enormously fat child is not healthy, especially if it increases in weight or height very rapidly.

Great unhappiness and suffering may be saved if the monstrosity ceases to develop, for he is often a burden to himself, is never well, and becomes only a freak, to be exhibited in a side-show, not a man, ready and fit to do a man's work in the world. If unfortunately the case is allowed to go too far, or there are other complications, as in the case of John Michael, then the surgeon is called in, and he affords relief at once when he recognizes the source of the trouble.

The famous philosopher Descartes, founder of the Cartesian philosophy, claimed that the hypophysis was the "Seat of the Soul." The guess which he made is being realized in a physical sense at least, for it is now being recognized as the controlling factor in the body of every vertebrate. If it is well, then all is apt to be well, but if it is disordered, either in itself or is interfered with by growths near it, the entire system is thrown into confusion, we grow to enormous height or awful breadth, and die untimely deaths.

How to Make Yourself an Agreeable and Welcome Summer Guest---

By Mrs. Frank Learned,

Author of "The Etiquette of New York To-day."

AT this season, when invitations to make country visits are received by most persons, it is very useful to know how these affairs may be made pleasant for one's self, one's host and fellow guests. Mrs. Frank Learned, the author, who is also a member of New York and Newport fashionable society, here gives some very useful suggestions:

By Mrs. Frank Learned.

THE law of courtesy requires that one should be prompt in answering an invitation to stay at a friend's house. When writing to accept, it is necessary to repeat the date named by the hostess and the hour for the train mentioned by her. Mistakes are thus avoided.

When the day comes it may be a satisfaction to a hostess to receive a telegram stating the time one expects to arrive. This is an assurance that nothing has interfered with the plan agreed upon.

When writing a regret in reply to the invitation there should be no suggestion in it that one would be glad to come at some future time. The note should contain an appreciation of the kind invitation and sincere regret that it cannot be accepted on account of other engagements, or whatever the cause may be.

Many things contribute toward making yourself an agreeable and a welcome guest, one whose qualities are so delightful as to give constant pleasure during a visit, and who goes away leaving a sense of true regret for the departure in the hearts of host and hostess.

Don't Pluck Flowers in Your Hostess's Garden.

Promptness in keeping the appointment is important. Dilatoriness is a serious blunder on the part of an expected guest, who cannot know how inconvenient this may be to the plans of a hostess; therefore one should be most careful not to miss the train named.

Adaptability and tactfulness are very necessary qualifications. One must adapt one's self immediately to the ways of the household, that the regular order of things may not be disturbed. If uncertain about waking in the morning, it is well to ask to be called. Punctuality at meals is essential. In some households breakfast is sent to a guest's room, but if this is not the custom where one is staying, promptness at breakfast is expected in American households, as a general rule.

One should always be at the disposal of those at whose house one is a guest. If plans are suggested one accedes to them cheerfully, and one is always dressed in time to go out for drives, walks, or for any other diversions. It is tedious and annoying for others to be kept waiting by someone who is never ready.

In fact, thought of self must be given up. A guest who fancies that a visit is altogether for her pleasure, and that little or no return is due the hostess for hospitality, makes a fatal mistake in good manners. Consideration is an evidence of good breeding. It is an obligation not to make any plans or engagements without consulting the hostess in advance. If there is any doubt between two courses of action, the convenience of those in whose house one is a guest is the chief point to be regarded.

It would seem obvious that a well-bred person would not fail in courtesy, but young girls are occasionally forgetful or too much occupied with their own plans and interests. For instance, it is a breach of etiquette for a girl to make a convenience of a friend's house to receive a man friend or acquaintance who is not in favor in her own home. If she has in the neighborhood young men friends, she should not receive visits from them without first asking her hostess if it will be agreeable to her to have them call. When her friends call she should be careful to introduce them to her hostess. Girls sometimes need to be reminded of these little things.

While under a friend's roof another duty is to be in happy spirits, satisfied with the amusements and occupations provided, and to express pleasure in everything that is done for one's entertainment. This does not mean that one should have an effusive manner, as it is not well-bred to have what someone has called a "vividly picturesque" manner.

A thoughtful person takes the trouble to be agreeable to others who may be staying in the house. One should show special attention to older persons, members of the family, or others who may not seem quite so interesting as youthful companions, but to whom deference is due. It is very winning not to seem vague, inattentive or bored under any circumstances. If by a misadventure someone may be among the guests who is disliked, or with whom one is not on a friendly footing, or who may be even an enemy, it is a duty not to let the hostess perceive the state of one's feelings. Fine tact and wisdom must be exercised in a case of the sort.

Accede Cheerfully to the Hostess's Plans.

Well-bred persons do not discuss with other guests the affairs or peculiarities of the family life; nor do they criticise one guest to another. If they observe any unpleasant occurrence they are discreetly absent-minded. They are careful not to take liberties. If necessary to use a telephone, it is proper to ask permission, and never infringe on any privilege granted. If wishing to take a book or a magazine from the library to one's room, one should ask permission, and be sure to return it to its place before leaving. One should not pluck flowers from ornamental gardens. If a horse or a motor is placed at the disposal of a guest great care should be taken in its use.

Talents or accomplishments should be used for the pleasure of the household. If one can sing, play, take a hand at cards, help to get up games, charades, or a picnic, tell bright stories, tell fortunes by cards, or character by palmistry or handwriting, these things come in most acceptably when on a visit.

To know when to efface one's self is a talent in itself. A guest who is forever seeming to exact or expect attention is tiresome. It is a mark of good manners to relieve a hostess of one's presence at some time of the day, to go to one's room, write letters, read, or rest in the afternoon. This should be made a habit.

A man may take a cigar, a book, a newspaper, and retire to a corner of a veranda, or go for a walk, or practice some sport. Everyone needs to have resources to get on happily in this world, and to be able to entertain one's self is a qualification to be striven for when on a visit.

Another point is to be careful in one's room of all the belongings and not to leave one's own things in disorder. No matter how many servants there may be, it is right not to require them to do too much, and if a household is managed moderately a guest should be even more considerate.

The wise guest is never persuaded to prolong a visit beyond the time originally stated. There is danger in wearing out one's welcome. The pleasant impression made during a stay may be destroyed. It is safe to have a provisional engagement at home, and to go. If there is some very good reason to believe that when urged to remain one may really add to the pleasure of everyone, an exception may be made to the rule, although it is not advisable, and the final date for leaving should not be allowed to be unsettled. It is best to be rather punctilious in these matters, even with very intimate friends.

When going away, the custom is to give a fee to the maid who has cared for one's room and to any other servant who may have rendered some special personal service.

After a visit it is obligatory to write a note to one's hostess soon after one's return home, and to express in appreciative words the pleasure one has had from her kindness and hospitality.

How the METER BREATHES and MEASURES the GAS YOU BURN

FACTS WORTH KNOWING About the Way the EFFICIENT GAS METER WORKS

TO MOST housekeepers and heads of families the gas meter down in the basement is a mystery, and usually under suspicion. Sometimes these suspicions are justified, but there should not be any mystery associated with a mechanism in which no substantial improvement has been made in sixty years.

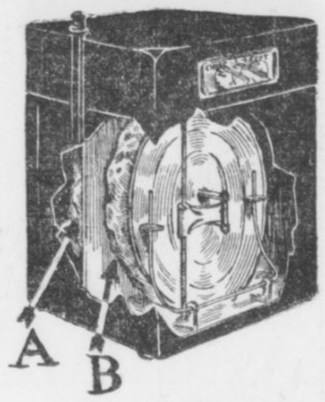
The three dials which register the passage of gas through the meter are in plain view on the outside of the machine. Together they record the passage of gas in cubic feet up to one hundred thousand.

As there is no motive power except the pressure of the gas in passing through the meter, only the actual consumption of gas or a leak in the service pipe causes any change in the record of the dials. Faulty mechanism may cause the meter to run too fast or too slow, but it cannot be "fixed" to run up a consumer's bill whether gas passes through or not. If no gas is being consumed and the meter goes on working, then a leak in the house or apartment service pipe is the answer.

In the upper part of the meter just behind the dials is the registering mechanism. Below is a pair of bellows, or diaphragms, as they are called. These diaphragms inhale and exhale gas just as the human lungs inhale and exhale air, except that they operate alternately. While one is filling up the other is discharging its contents into the service pipe.

Each one, when inflated, holds a fixed and definite volume of gas and measures the invisible and intangible substance just as we might measure water with a pint dipper. This alternate opening and closing of the diaphragms sets in motion a train of gears which records the amount of gas passing through the meter, and as this motion must cease when the gas ceases to flow it is obvious that the hands of the dials cannot move unless gas is either being burned or is escaping.

The diaphragms are two circular sheets of metal joined by a piece of sheepskin thoroughly saturated with oil. The skins used for the purpose have to be selected with great care. Each pelt is examined in a dark closet by a man who passes it over a table in which there is a hole about four inches square. Through this a light is thrown from beneath, and thus any defect in the skin is quickly revealed. It takes a flock of three hundred thousand sheep every year to keep the gas meters of the United States in repair.



The Measuring "Lungs" of a Gas Meter. A and B Are Each Two Metal Discs Bound Together by Prepared Flexible Sheepskin. When the Gas Pressure Has Expanded A to Its Limit, B Begins to Fill, and A to Discharge into the Service Pipe. This Process Is Automatic While Gas Is Being Consumed.

The law commonly recognizes as accurate a meter which is not more than 2 per cent slow or 2 per cent fast, and in Massachusetts, New York, California and Maryland all meters must be tested and sealed by State officials before they are installed. Many of the larger cities have similar regulations. If at any time the housewife has reason to believe that the meter is not registering correctly, she can apply to the authorities having such matters in charge to have it tested again. The small fee charged for this service is paid by the consumer, if the meter is found to be correct, or slow, and by the gas company if it is fast.

The gas companies claim that their system of reading the meter record and rendering bills for gas consumed requires any error made in one month to be automatically corrected the next month. If the hands on the dials are between two numbers the rule is to read the lesser number.

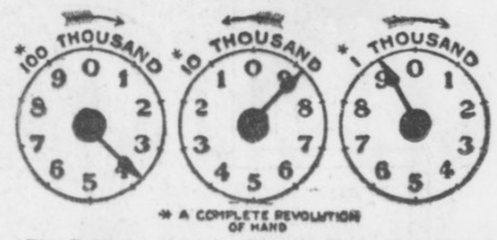
If the gas man makes the minuend or upper line of the sum in subtraction too large—by reading, for instance, 39,900 instead of 38,900—the subtrahend or lower line will obviously be a thousand larger next month than if he hadn't made the mistake, and so things will be evened up.

Slowness in the meter is caused by friction in the registering machinery, in which case the company loses. Undue rapidity is likely to result when the meter is placed too near the heating apparatus. The atmosphere then gets too dry and the meter pants as if short of breath.

A frequently unsuspected cause of gas waste is the burners. The standard flat-flame burner, which many of the companies supply to their patrons, burns five cubic feet of gas an hour; but there are burners often recommended by dealers for some reason or other which will consume from ten to fifteen feet an hour.

A burner made entirely of metal is a thing to be avoided, as metal is a conductor of heat, and anything that withdraws heat from the flame lessens the luminosity. The most economical and satisfactory burner is one having an incandescant mantle. It not only gives a better light, but decreases the consumption of gas to three and a half feet an hour.

There is little doubt that ignorant or careless housemaids are responsible for much of the gas wastage popularly charged against "lying" meters. Every one engaged in housework should be taught how to use a gas stove economically—for it is here that opportunities for waste are most numerous and often unsuspected.



The Pointers on a Gas Meter's Dials Are Moved by the Pressure of the Gas Passing Through Its Measuring "Lungs" or Bellows. Together, as the Diagram Shows, They Indicate the Passage of from 100 to 100,000 Cubic Feet of Gas.

Are Our SAILS All WRONG?

HAS the world been wrong all these centuries in its use of solid sails for sailing vessels? Can it be true that if holes are punched in the canvas of the sails the boat will go faster? It is claimed in all seriousness by some foreign investigators that we have been mistaken in the theory of the utilization of the wind for sailing, and that the right way to use the wind is to let it blow on the sail and then pass through, giving a chance to succeeding puffs of wind to reach the sails. A Captain Vassalo asserts positively that he increased the speed of his yacht one-fifth by punching holes in the sails. He claims that when there is no hole in the sail a counter-pressure is created in the beliying sail, and that there is a cone of dead air in the sail which prevents the attack of the succeeding blasts upon the sail. The blast of air that strikes the solid sail first rebounds and drives back against the following blasts of wind, weakening them to the extent of one-fifth their power.

It is suggested that the holes should not be too large, and ought to be in proportion to the size of the sail, for the wind should not pass through the sail without having done its propulsive work. It is well to experiment first by piercing two holes toward the bottom of the sail, and then gradually increasing the number, as found necessary.

Other experiments have been made along this line, going even so far as to make the sail in overlapping strips, which, being attached to each other by bands a few feet apart, yet separate and let the wind through after it has done its pushing, giving room to the following waves of air to reach the sails directly. Experiment has proved that these bands should not be too narrow to secure the greatest efficiency. Here is an opportunity for some expert to determine precisely how a sail ought to be constructed to secure the greatest possible speed.

Why RIVERS Usually Divert THUNDERSTORMS

DURING the daytime and especially in the Summer a thunderstorm will never cross a large river. This rule holds good in almost every case, except where there is a city on either side of the stream. At first thought this seems odd. One can understand a fire or a witch not crossing running water, but a thunderstorm? Perhaps the fact that at night and in the Winter time the river forms a less obdurate barrier may give a clue.

A thunderstorm, as generally understood, is a large dark cloud lying low, above which are very dense white clouds that look like exploded cotton bales; from this cloud formation heavy rain falls; before the rain there is usually a violent squall of wind, just before the wind there is a sharp drop in temperature. A thunderstorm always cools the air for a while, and usually lasts about an hour and a half. Such a thunderstorm is common in Summer, particularly when the air is sultry and oppressive and it is found all over the world from the Equator to the Pole.

Where did the thunderstorm come from? What gave it birth? In the answer to these questions lies the answer to the problem of the difficulty the squall finds in crossing a wide river.

Air is heated from the bottom. The rays of the sun are transmitted readily, as the air absorbs very little. Dry earth reflects little of the sun's heat, transmits very light and absorbs it nearly all. It therefore radiates heat well. Consequently the air is heated little from the surface of the earth upward, not from the upper layers downward. Heated air rises, therefore there must be a break in the upper layers of air to let the heated air through. These rising columns of warm, moist air rise until they reach a height where they can expand. As gas expands it cools, and the moist air cooling forms a thick, white cloud. If the cloud is large enough the cloud cannot hold the moisture, a rain-cloud forms beneath it, the dew-point is reached and raindrops form.

In the meantime the air under the cloud becomes suddenly colder, and consequently heavier. This makes a descending current of cold air. The air under the cloud becomes colder for three reasons, because of the reaction against the rising hot air, because the air under the cloud is shielded from the sun, and because the falling raindrops chill the air through which they pass. This cold air rushes to the earth's surface because of the forward movement of the shower, and also to replace the heated air which is rising up the column.

Since the life and continuance of a thundershower depend on the steady rise of a column of heated air, it becomes easy to see why a river forms a barrier. Water reflects a great deal of sunlight and absorbs most of the rest. It radiates very little. The air is therefore colder on a river, and there is a gentle curent toward either bank to take the place of the air rising from the land. In order to keep up the supply of cooler air flowing to the two banks a descending cold current of air forms over the river. When the thunderstorm, depending on a rising condition of heated air, is confronted by a descending current of cooler air, it cannot go on. The storm, then, either is deflected and moves along the river bank, or it stops abruptly, forms dense cloud masses and some distance beyond the river catches another ascending column of air and builds a new storm.

Futurist Fashions

Modern Tendencies in Art as Applied to Dress by Lady Duff-Gordon and Artist Bakst

"Isis," Leon Bakst's Conception of the Futurist Costume for the Ultra-Modern Woman, Designed to Give Freedom of Soul as Well as of Movement.

LADY DUFF-GORDON, the famous "Lucile" of London, and foremost creator of fashions in the world, writes each week the fashion article for this newspaper, presenting all that is newest and best in styles for well-dressed women.

Lady Duff-Gordon's Paris establishment brings her into close touch with that centre of fashion.

By Lady Duff-Gordon ("Lucile").

LEON BAKST, the Russian painter and designer of the Russian ballet costumes, has entered the world of fashion and has proven that after all to design a woman's costume is as artistically important as to paint a great Madonna. In the other days no artist, no painter of world-wide reputation would have dared "descend" to the designing of fashions, but to-day's standards are changed, and no painter feels that he is "descending" when he creates a costume that compels attention and admiration from all the world.

I am delighted to be able to send you three pictures of designs just made by the painter. Each differs from the other, although each is perfect in its way. And at the same time I am sending you my own conceptions of the same ideas.

Naturally Bakst, above all others, understands his own importance in the art world, and he adopts a rather pleased patronage toward the very women for whom he is now creating. Just what development in our modern life is responsible for the present great importance of woman's wear I cannot decide quite to my satisfaction. Perhaps it is the tremendous increase in our wealth, but there were great fortunes in other days.

There must be some sensualism in every great painting, else it would not be great. By sensualism I do not mean the sensualism of the first paintings of Bakst, but the merest hint conveyed by color that gives richness and removes the austere. Bakst's theory is that certain shades of yellow and red convey the idea of passion, and therefore he uses these shades when he wishes to portray sensuality in his costumes. He says that to convey this tendency in his design would be vulgar, but to convey it in color is art, and true art is never vulgar or suggestive.

In his paintings Bakst dyed his colors to match the soul of the character he portrayed, and in his ballet costumes he did the same. For instance, his Cleopatra was a wonderful, a gloriously daring conception of the great queen's character. Her voluptuousness, her passions, her uncertainties of temper are all shown in her clothes. One feels that they are alive.

With tremendous discrimination and the subtlest art this master is doing this same thing in his fashion designs. When he decided to enter this new field he became imbued with the idea that to create the perfect costume for woman he must build it on her most prominent characteristic. Long and many were his discussions on this theory with me in my atelier, and finally he evolved the theory that the chief characteristic of the modern woman was her "sportiveness," as we would say in England, but which you in America would call "interest in sports."

With "sportiveness" the characteristic of modern woman and her great inclination to advance, Bakst based his new costumes on woman's desire for freedom—freedom of soul as well as of movement.

As he said one day to me over the teacups when this idea was filling his mind, "I think I can best explain my aims by saying that I wish to express the springtime of the earth sartorially. To me the springtime is the futurist season of the year. Nature at that season is striving after the best. Also I wish for something frank and unconventional. The modern woman, you know, has both these qualities to a marked degree."

"Lucile" Costume, Expressing the Extreme Modernity of the Day Even More Effectively Than Bakst.

And now, do you not agree with me that he has achieved that for which he strove?

In "Isis" he shows the ultra modernity of woman. A freakish costume, you say? Ah, not so. Every line, every bit of drapery has a meaning of its own to its creator. Every shading of color has its meaning.

My own conception of this same idea differs from that of Bakst, but after all, as you will see, the same thought is there. The same outline is suggested. I have made a greater concession perhaps to the feeling that in everyday life we cannot be too extreme, that our clothes must after all be made so that we can wear them on ordinary occasions.

But while I may make concessions as to form and design I never do as to color. I feel that my own color creations are superior to all others, and never do I allow any criticism. Do I not spend my days, the hours of the night as well as those of the day, in this ever fascinating search for color?

In this first design I have allowed for the freedom of movement that Bakst deems so important. The fabric used is a satin charmeuse, and the shade is a rare and glorious blue that I produced in my own workshop, spending long hours over the dye pot to achieve it.

The hat that I desire worn with this costume is plain, and has a wide brim. The only trimming is a sash of blue dyed to match the garment. Is there not beauty and grace as well as usefulness in this costume?

But to return to Bakst. "Philomele" is a costume that epitomizes the springtime of the earth and the reaching out into the future to its creator, who says that he was inspired by the period when the race was young, when civilization was at its best. There is more than a suggestion of the Egyptian in this costume, not only in color, but in form. And it does convey the idea of freedom of movement to a great degree, I think.

In "Iolante" there is a wonderful clarity of outline, and, oh, the wonder of the color! It is my one regret that while you are able to see the design, it is of course impossible for you to have the real colors reproduced. While this third figure appears attenuated when compared with the others, it is not so in reality. It is the outcome of the restlessness of the modern woman. Woman, like the earth, is at her most restless period at this time.

"Iolante," a Second Conception of Bakst, Symbolizing the Sporting Interests of the Modern Woman

The second picture of my own is a conception of the same restlessness, but again my conception differs from that of the artist. Perhaps because I am a woman first and an artist afterward, I firmly believe that it takes a woman to understand a woman. Men may have wonderful theories as to our thoughts and aspirations, wonderful reasons for our being what we are, but only a woman really knows the soul of woman.

Therefore I am sure that my conceptions of the modern woman will be more pleasing to woman than those of Monsieur Bakst, but who can deny the glory and beauty of his work?

The SCARLET PLAGUE

By Jack London

SYNOPSIS OF PREVIOUS INSTALMENT—It was in the year 2073. Sixty years had passed since the Scarlet Plague had tumbled civilization back into the hunting and fishing stage. The last survivor of the great disaster was telling his savage grandchildren, as they sat on the deserted beach near San Francisco, of how it all happened.

Chapter II

"AND I was very happy," continued the old man, "and I had beautiful things to eat. And my hands were soft, because I did no work with them, and my body was clean all over and dressed in the softest garments—" He surveyed his mangy goat-skin with disgust. "We did not wear such things in those days. Even the slaves had better garments. And we were most clean. We washed our faces and hands often every day. You boys never wash unless you fall into the water or go in swimming."

"Neither do you, Granser," Hoo-Hoo retorted.

"I know, I know. I am a filthy old man, but times have changed. Nobody washes these days, and there are no conveniences. It is sixty years since I have seen a piece of soap. You do not know what soap is, and I shall not tell you, for I am telling the story of the Scarlet Death. You know what sickness is. We called it a disease. Very many of the diseases came from what we called germs. Remember that word—germs. A germ is a very small thing. It is like a woodtick, such as you find on the dogs in the spring of the year when they run in the forest. Only the germ is very small. It is so small that you cannot see it—"

Hoo-Hoo began to laugh.

"You're a queer un, Granser, talking about things you can't see. If you can't see 'em, how do you know they are? That's what I want to know. How do you know anything you can't see?"

"A good question, a very good question, Hoo-Hoo. But we did see—some of them. We had what we called microscopes and ultramicroscopes, and we put them to our eyes and looked through them, so that we saw things larger than they really were, and many things we could not see without the microscope at all. Our best ultramicroscope could make a germ look forty thousand times larger. A mussel-shell is a thousand fingers like Edwin's. Take forty mussel-shells, and by as many times larger was the germ when we looked at it through a microscope. And after that, we had other ways, by using what we called moving pictures, of making the forty-thousand-times germ many, many thousand times larger still. And thus we saw all these things which our eyes of themselves could not see. Take a grain of sand. Break it into ten pieces. Take one piece and break it into ten. Break one of those pieces into ten, and one of those into ten, and one of those into ten, and one of those into ten, and do it all day, and maybe, by sunset, you will have a piece as small as one of the germs."

The boys were openly incredulous. Hare-Lip sniffed and sneered and Hoo-Hoo snickered, until Edwin nudged them to be silent.

"The woodtick sucks the blood of the dog, but the germ, being so very small, goes right into the blood of the body, and there it has many children. In those days there would be as many as a billion—a crab-shell, please—as many as that crab-shell in one man's body. We called germs micro-organisms. When a few million, or a billion, of them were in a man, in all the blood of a man, he was sick. These germs were a disease. There were many different kinds of them—more different kinds than there are grains of sand on this beach. We knew only a few of the kinds. The micro-organic world was an invisible world, a world we could not see, and we knew very little about it. Yet we did know something. There was the bacillus anthracis; there was the micrococcus; there was the Bacterium termo, and the Bacterium lactis—that's what turns the goat milk sour even to this day, Hare-Lip; and there were Schizo-mycetes without end. And there were many others . . ."

Here the old man launched into a disquisition on germs and their nature, using words and phrases of such extraordinary length and meaninglessness that the boys grinned at one another and looked out over the deserted ocean till they forgot the old man was babbling on.

"But the Scarlet Death, Granser," Edwin at last suggested.

Granser recollected himself, and with a start tore himself away from the rostrum of the lecture-hall, where, to another-world audience, he had been expounding the latest theory, sixty years gone, of germs and germ-diseases.

"Yes, yes, Edwin; I had forgotten. Sometimes the memory of the past is very strong upon me, and I forget that I am a dirty old man, clad in goat-skin, wandering with my savage grandsons who are goat-herds in the primeval wilderness. 'The fleeting systems lapse like foam,' and so lapsed our glorious, colossal civilization. I am a Granser, a tired old man. I belong to the tribe of Santa Rosans. I married into that tribe. My sons and daughters married into the Chauffeurs, the Sacramentos, and the Palo-Altos. You, Hare-Lip, are of the Chauffeurs. You, Edwin, are of the Sacramentos. And you, Hoo-Hoo, are of the Palo-Altos. Your tribe takes its name from a town that was near the seat of another great institution of learning. It was called Stanford University. Yes, I remember now. It is perfectly clear. I was telling you of the Scarlet Death. Where was I in my story?"

"You were telling about germs, the things you can't see but which make men sick," Edwin prompted.

The man to whom it belonged, a quiet, sober, but stupid and obstinate fellow was defending it

Copyright, 1913, by Jack London

"Yes, that's where I was. A man did not notice at first when only a few of these germs got into his body. But each germ broke in half and became two germs, and they kept doing this very rapidly so that in a short time there were many millions of them in the body. Then the man was sick. He had a disease, and the disease was named after the kind of a germ that was in him. It might be measles, it might be influenza, it might be yellow fever; it might be any of thousands and thousands of kinds of diseases.

"Now this is the strange thing about these germs. There were always new ones coming in to live in men's bodies. Long and long and long ago, when there were only a few men in the world, there were few diseases. But as men increased and lived closely together in great cities and civilizations, new diseases arose, new kinds of germs entered their bodies. Thus were countless millions and billions of human beings killed. And the more thickly men packed together, the more terrible were the new diseases that came to be. Long before my time, in the middle ages, there was the Black Plague that swept across Europe. It swept across Europe many times. There was tuberculosis, that entered into men wherever they were thickly packed. A hundred years before my time there was the bubonic plague. And in Africa was the sleeping sickness. The bacteriologists fought all these sicknesses and destroyed them.

Copyright, 1913, by the Star Co.

just as you boys fight the wolves away from your goats, or squash the mosquitoes that light on you. The bacteriologists—"

"But, Granser, what is a what-you-call-it?" Edwin interrupted.

"You, Edwin, are a goatherd. Your task is to watch the goats. You know a great deal about goats. A bacteriologist watches germs. That is his task, and he knows a great deal about them. So, as I was saying, the bacteriologists fought with the germs and destroyed them—sometimes. There was leprosy, a horrible disease. A hundred years before I was born, the bacteriologists discovered the germ of leprosy. They knew all about it. They made pictures of it. I have seen those pictures. But they never found a way to kill it. But in 1984 there was the Pantoblast Plague, a disease that broke out in a country called Brazil, and that killed millions of people. But the bacteriologists found it out, and found the way to kill it, so that the Pantoblast Plague went no farther. They made what they called a serum, which they put into a man's body, and which killed the pantoblast germs without killing the man. And in 1910 there was Pellagra, and also the hookworm. These were easily killed by the bacteriologists. But in 1947 there arose a new disease that had never been seen before. It got into the bodies of babies of only ten months old or less, and it made them unable to move their hands and feet, or to eat, or anything; and the bacteriologists were eleven years in discovering how to kill that particular germ and save the babies.

"In spite of all these diseases, and of all the new ones that continued to arise, there were more and more men in the world. This was because it was easy to get food. The easier it was to get food, the more men there were; the more men there were, the more thickly they were packed together on the earth; and the more thickly they were packed, the more new kinds of germs became diseases. There were warnings. Soldervetsky, as early as 1929, told the bacteriologists that they had no guaranty against some new disease, a thousand times more deadly than any they knew, arising and killing by the hundreds of millions and even by the billion. You see, the mirco-organic world remained a mystery to the end. They knew there was such a world, and that from time to time armies of new germs emerged from it to kill man. And that was all they knew about it. For all they knew, in that invisible micro-organic world there might be as many different kinds of germs as there are grains of sand on this beach. And also, in that same invisible world it might well be that new kinds of germs came to be. It might be there that life originated—the 'abysmal fecundity,' Soldervetszky called it, applying the words of other men who had written before him . . . "

It was at this point that Hare-Lip rose to his feet, an expression of huge contempt on his face.

"Granser," he announced, "you make me sick with your gabble. Why don't you tell about the Red Death? If you ain't going to, say so, an' we'll start back for camp."

The old man looked at him and silently began to cry. The weak tears of age rolled down his cheeks, and all the feebleness of his eighty-seven years showed in his grief-stricken countenance.

"Sit down," Edwin counseled soothingly. "Granser's all right. He's just gettin' to the Scarlet Death, ain't you, Granser? He's just goin' to tell us about it right now. Sit down, Hare-Lip. Go ahead, Granser."

The old man wiped the tears away on his grimy knuckles and took up the tale in a tremulous, piping voice that soon strengthened as he got the swing of the narrative.

"It was in the summer of 2013 that the Plague came. I was twenty-seven years old, and well do I remember it. Wireless dispatches—"

Hare-Lip spat loudly his disgust, and Granser hastened to make amends.

"We talked through the air in those days, thousands and thousands of miles. And the word came of a strange disease that had broken out in New York. There were seventeen millions of people living then in that noblest city of America. Nobody thought anything about the news. It was only a small thing. There had been only a few deaths. It seemed, though, that they had died very quickly, and that one of the first signs of the disease was the turning red of the face and all the body. Within twenty-four hours came the report of the first case in Chicago. And on the same day it was made public that London, the greatest city in the world, next to Chicago, had been secretly fighting the plague for two weeks and censoring the news dispatches—that is, not permitting the word to go forth to the rest of the world that London had the plague.

"It looked serious, but we in California, like everywhere else, were not alarmed. We were sure that the bacteriologists would find a way to overcome this new germ just as they had overcome other germs in the past. But the trouble was the astonishing quickness with which this germ destroyed human beings, and the fact that it inevitably killed any human body it entered. No one ever recovered. There was the old Asiatic cholera, when you might eat dinner with a well man in the evening, and the next morning, if you got up early enough, you would see him being hauled by your window in the death-cart. But this new plague was quicker than that—much quicker. From the moment of the first signs of it, a man would be dead in an hour. Some lasted for several hours. Many died within ten or fifteen minutes of the appearance of the first sign.

"The heart began to beat faster and the heat of the body to increase. Then came the scarlet rash, spreading like wildfire over the face and body. Most persons never noticed the increase in heat and heart-beat, and the first they knew was when the scarlet rash came out. Usually, they had convulsions at the time of the appearance of the rash. But these convulsions did not last long and were not very severe. If one lived through them, he became perfectly quiet, and only did he feel a numbness swiftly creeping up his body from the feet. The heels became numb first, then the legs, and hips, and when the numbness reached as high as his heart he died. They did not rave or sleep. Their minds always remained cool and calm up to the moment their heart numbed and stopped. And another strange thing was the rapidity of decomposition. No sooner was a person dead than the body seemed to fall to pieces, to fly apart, to melt away even as you looked at it. That was one of the reasons the plague spread so rapidly. All the billions of germs in a corpse were so immediately released.

"And it was because of all this that the bacteriologists had so little chance in fighting the germs. They were killed in their laboratories even as they studied the germs of the Scarlet Death. They were heroes. As fast as they perished, others stepped forth and took their places. It was in London that they first isolated it. The news was telegraphed everywhere. Trask was the name of the man who succeeded in this, but within thirty hours he was dead. Then came the struggle in all the laboratories to find something that would kill the plague germs. All drugs failed. You see, the problem was to get a drug, or serum, that would kill the germs in the body and not kill the body. They tried to fight it with other germs, to put into the body of a sick man germs that were enemies of the plague germs—"

"And you can't see these germ-things, Granser," Hare-Lip objected, "and here you gabble, gabble, gabble about them as if they was anything, when they're nothing at all. Anything you can't see, ain't, that's what. Fighting things that ain't with things that ain't! They must have been all fools in them days. That's why they croaked. I ain't goin' to believe in such rot, I tell you that."

Granser promptly began to weep, while Edwin hotly took up his defence.

"Look here, Hare-Lip, you believe in lots of things you can't see."

Hare-Lip shook his head.

"You believe in dead men walking about. You never seen one dead man walk about."

"I tell you I seen 'em, last winter, when I was wolf-hunting with dad."

"Well, you always spit when you cross running water," Edwin challenged.

"That's to keep off bad luck," was Hare-Lip's defence.

"You believe in bad luck?"

"Sure."

"An' you ain't never seen bad luck," Edwin concluded triumphantly. "You're just as bad as Granser and his germs. You believe in what you don't see. Go on, Granser."

Hare-Lip, crushed by this metaphysical defeat, remained silent, and the old man went out. Often and often, though this narrative must not be clogged by the details, was Granser's tale interrupted while the boys squabbled among themselves. Also, among themselves they kept up a constant low-voiced exchange of explanation and conjecture, as they strove to follow the old man into his unknown and vanished world.

"The Scarlet Death broke out in San Francisco. The first death came on a Monday morning. By Thursday they were dying like flies in Oakland and San Francisco. They died everywhere—in their beds, at their work, walking along the street. It was on Tuesday that I saw my first death—Miss Collbran, one of my students, sitting right there before my eyes, in my lecture-room. I noticed her face while I was talking. It had suddenly turned scarlet. I ceased speaking and could only look at her, for the first fear of the plague was already on all of us and we knew that it had come. The young women screamed and ran out of the room. So did the young men run out, all but two. Miss Collbran's convulsions were very mild and lasted less than a minute. One of the young men fetched her a glass of water. She drank only a little of it, and cried out:

"'My feet! All sensation has left them!'

"After a minute she said, 'I have no feet. I am unaware that I have any feet. And my knees are cold. I can scarcely feel that I have knees.'

"She lay on the floor, a bundle of note-books under her head. And we could do nothing. The coldness and the numbness crept up past her hips to her heart, and when it reached her heart she was dead. In fifteen minutes, by the clock—I had timed it—she was dead, there in my own classroom, dead. And she was a very beautiful, strong, healthy young woman. And from the first sign of the plague to her death only fifteen minutes elapsed. That will show you how swift was the Scarlet Death.

"Yet in those few minutes I remained with the dying woman in my classroom, the alarm had spread over the university; and the students, by thousands, all of them, had deserted the lecture-rooms and laboratories. When I emerged, on my way to make report to the President of the Faculty, I found the university deserted. Across the campus were several stragglers hurrying for their homes. Two of them were running.

"President Hoag I found in his office, all alone, looking very old and very gray, with a multitude of wrinkles in his face that I had never seen before. At the sight of me he pulled himself to his feet and tottered away to the inner office, banging the door after him and locking it. You see, he knew I had been exposed and he was afraid. He shouted to me through the door to go away. I shall never forget my feelings as I walked down the silent corridors and out across the deserted campus. I was not afraid. I had been exposed, and I looked upon myself as already dead. It was not that, but a feeling of awful depression that impressed me. Everything had stopped. It was like the end of the world to me—my world. I had been born within sight and sound of the university. It had been my predestined career. My father had been a professor before me, and his father before him. For a century and a half had this university, like a splendid machine, been running steadily on. And now, in an instant, it had stopped. It was like seeing the sacred flame die down on some thrice sacred altar. I was shocked, unutterably shocked.

The woman screamed and was felled with a fist blow by one of the brutes

"When I arrived home, my housekeeper screamed as I entered and fled away. And when I rang, I found the housemaid had likewise fled. I investigated. In the kitchen I found the cook on the point of departure. But she screamed, too, and in her haste dropped a suit-case of her personal belongings and ran out of the house and across the grounds, still screaming. I can hear her scream to this day. You see, we did not act in this way when ordinary diseases smote us. We were always calm over such things, and sent for the doctors and nurses who knew just what to do. But this was different. It struck so suddenly, and killed so swiftly, and never missed a stroke. When the scarlet rash appeared on a person's face, that person was marked by death. There was never a known case of recovery.

"I was alone in my big house. As I have told you before, in those days we could talk with one another over wires or through the air. The telephone bell rang, and I found my brother talking to me. He told me he was not coming home for fear of catching the plague from me, and that he had taken our two sisters to stop at Professor Bacon's home. He advised me to remain where I was, and wait to find out whether or not I had caught the plague.

"To all of this I agreed, staying in my house and for the first time in my life attempting to cook. And the plague did not come out on me. By means of the telephone I could talk with whomsoever I pleased and get the news. Also, there were the newspapers, and I ordered all of them to be thrown up to my door so that I could know what was happening with the rest of the world.

"New York City and Chicago were in chaos. And what happened with them was happening in all the large cities. A third of the New York police were dead. Their chief was also dead, likewise the mayor. All law and order had ceased. The bodies were lying in the streets unburied. All railroads and vessels carrying food and such things into the great city had ceased running, and mobs of the hungry poor were pillaging the stores and warehouses. Murder and robbery and drunkenness were everywhere. Already the people had fled from the city by millions—at first the rich, in their private motor-cars and dirigibles, and then the great mass of the population, on foot, carrying the plague with them, themselves starving and pillaging the farmers and all the towns and villages on the way.

"The man who sent this news, the wireless operator, was alone with his instrument on the top of a lofty building. The people remaining in the city—he estimated them at several hundred thousand—had gone mad from fear and drink, and on all sides of him great fires were raging. He was a hero, that man who staid by his post—an obscure newspaper man, most likely.

"For twenty-four hours, he said, no transatlantic airships had arrived, and no more messages were coming from England. He did state, though, that a message from Berlin—that's in Germany—announced that Hoffemeyer, a bacteriologist of the Metchnikoff School, had discovered the serum for the plague. That was the last word, to this day, that we of America ever received from Europe. If Hoffemeyer discovered the serum, it was too late, or otherwise, long ere this, explorers from Europe would have come looking for us. We can only conclude that what happened in America happened in Europe, and that, at the best, some several score may have survived the Scarlet Death on that whole continent.

"For one day longer the dispatches continued to come from New York. Then they, too, ceased. The man who had sent them perched in his lofty building, had either died of the plague or been consumed in the great conflagrations he had described as raging around him. And what had occurred in New York had been duplicated in all the other cities. It was the same in San Francisco, and Oakland, and Berkeley. By Thursday the people were dying so rapidly that corpses could not be handled, and dead bodies lay everywhere. Thursday night the panic outrush from the country began. Imagine, my grandsons, people, thicker than the salmon-run you have seen on the Sacramento River, pouring out of the cities by millions, madly over the country, in vain attempt to escape the ubiquitous death. You see, they carried the germs with them. Even the airships of the rich, fleeing for mountain and desert fastnesses, carried the germs.

"Hundreds of these airships escaped to Hawaii, and not only did they bring the plague with them, but they found the plague already there before them. This we learned by the dispatches, until all order in San Francisco vanished, and there were no operators left at their posts to receive or send. It was amazing, astounding, this loss of communication with the world. It was exactly as if the world had ceased, been blotted out. For sixty years that world has no longer existed for me. I know there must be such places as New York, Europe, Asia and Africa; but not one word has been heard of them—not in sixty years. With the coming of the Scarlet Death the world fell apart, absolutely, irretrievably. Ten thousand years of culture and civilization passed in the twinkling of an eye, 'lapsed like foam.'

"I was telling about the airships of the rich. They carried the plague with them and no matter where they fled, they died. I never encountered but one survivor of any of them—Mungerson. He was afterward a Santa Rosan, and he married my eldest daughter. He came into the tribe eight years after the plague. He was then nineteen years old, and he was compelled to wait twelve years more before he could marry. You see, there were no unmarried women, and some of the older daughters of the Santa Rosans were already bespoken. So he was forced to wait until my Mary had grown to sixteen years. It was his son, Gimp-Leg, who was killed last year by the mountain lion.

"Mungerson was eleven years old at the time of the plague. His father was one of the Industrial Magnates, a very wealthy, powerful man. It was on his airship, the Condor, that they were fleeing, with all the family, for the wilds of British Columbia, which is far to the north of here. But there was some accident, and they were wrecked near Mount Shasta. You have heard of that mountain. It is far to the north. The plague broke out among them and this boy of eleven was the only survivor. For eight years he was alone, wandering over a deserted land and looking vainly for his own kind. And at last, traveling south, he picked up with us, the Santa Rosans.

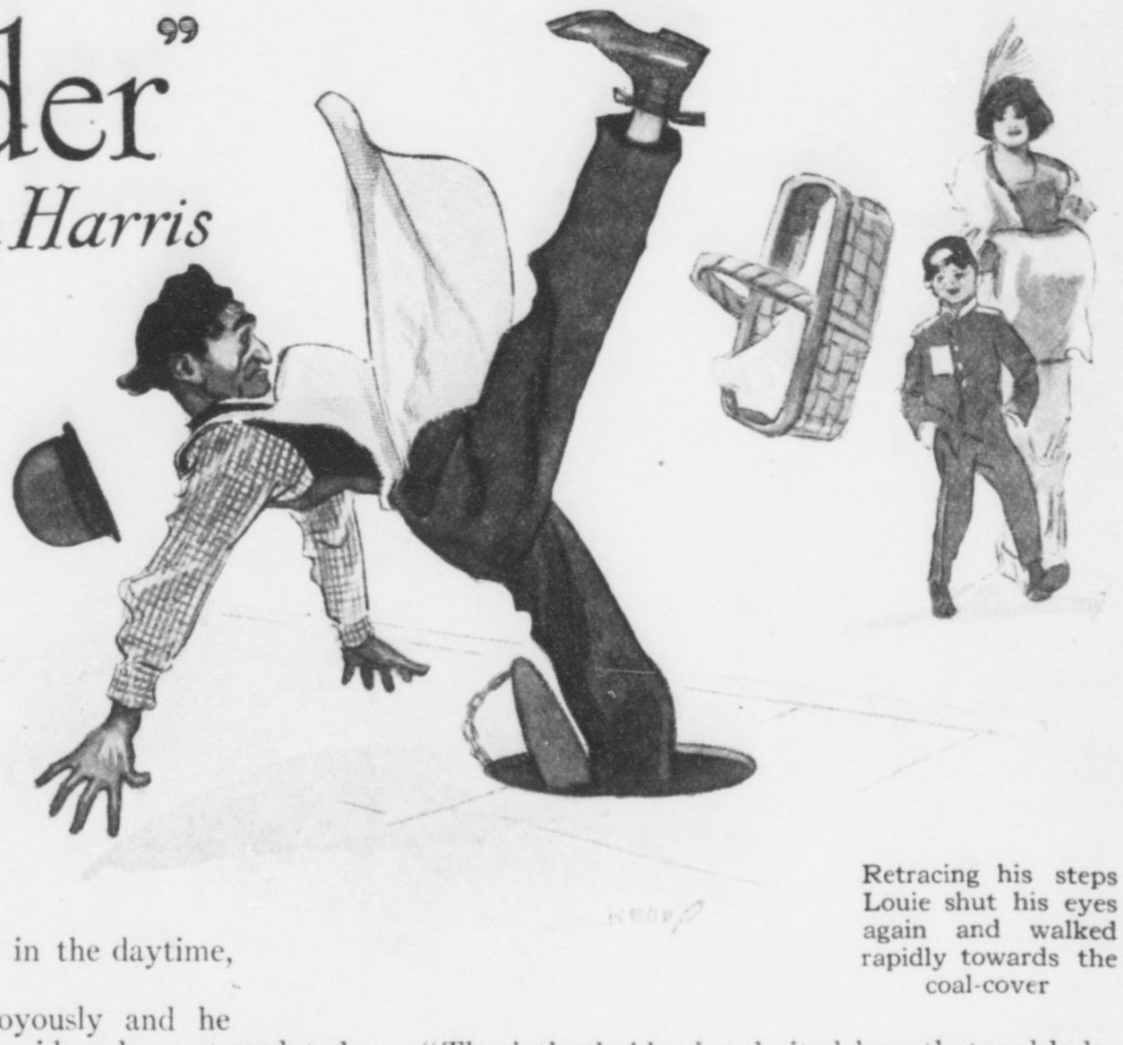
"Putting One Under"

By Newman Harris



Retracing his steps Louie shut his eyes again and walked rapidly towards the coal-cover

"AND how much do you think that Simon boy would get it, counsellor?" asked Finkelstone, deftly carving a slice of turkey for the sandwich the lawyer had ordered.

"I wouldn't be surprised if he didn't get a cent!" replied the lawyer.

Finkelstone raised his eyes from his task and scanned the lawyer's face searchingly for a moment.

"I guess you joke with me, counsellor, ain't it? A broken arm and he wouldn't get it a cent?"

"That's the trouble with you laymen, Louie: just because a feller falls down a flight of stairs and breaks his arm or leg you right away think he must got to collect. That ain't so. You first must got to prove it the owner knew there was a hole in the carpet or ought to have known it. Now in this Simon boy's case it would probably be a hard job to get witnesses to swear that hole had been there for years on account the carpet was practically new. That's something a layman couldn't understand."

"Well, counsellor, if you were the lame man perhaps you wouldn't understood it neither. If before a feller would fall down and break his leg he must got to go to woik and write it a letter the landlord there's a hole in the carpet, right away the landlord would fix it and there wouldn't be no accident at all, ain't it?"

"Not always, Louie! Why, I've got it now a case where a feller falls down a coal-hole, right around the corner here,—No. 63, one of them brown-stone houses, a feller by the name Epstein owns it—and I expect to collect big on account only a few weeks before that another feller falls down the same coal-hole, and this feller Epstein didn't even have that coal-cover repaired yet. Why—"

"And if another feller was to fall down that coal-hole before he fixes it, he would sure collect, counsellor?" interrupted Finkelstone eagerly.

"Of course, he would, Finkelstone. That feller Epstein is so stingy he would rather take it a chance he would have to pay for a dozen broken legs than to spend a few dollars for a new coal-cover. Such a feller like that deserves to get it in the neck."

"Believe me, counsellor, I know that lowlife from old. The least I would wish him is that every man, woman and child on the block, which most of them is customers from my store yet, y'understand, would go to woik and fall down his coal-hole and get it anyway a sprained ankle. For such a sprained ankle, counsellor, how much, now, could a feller get it by a court?"

"That depends, Louie,—but with a couple intelligent doctors on the case, y'understand, a sprained ankle might easily develop into a broken leg mit blood-poisoning and anything less than a thousand dollars we would consider a small voidict.

"It all depends too how a case is managed," he went on. "Why I had a case where a feller by the name Lorber cleaned up $250 just by keeping his mouth shut. He was riding in a car and the fuse blew out. He wouldn't of known nothing about it only the conductor tapped him on the shoulder and took down his name and address.

"A couple days later, an adjuster from the company goes up to see him. Mrs. Lorber wouldn't let him in on account Lorber is sleeping yet. A couple hours later the adjuster comes back and finding Lorber still in bed right away wants to settle for $50.

"Lorber didn't remember at first just when or where he was supposed to have been injured, but he has great presence of mind so he groaned and told the adjuster to go away.

"Every day for a week the adjuster called to see him, always offering him more money, but Lorber wouldn't accept it. Finally, the adjuster figured a feller like Lorber wouldn't lose so many days in bed unless he was really hoited, and offers him $250, and Lorber takes it and signs a release.

The next day the adjuster calls again to get his umbrella which he had left at Lorber's place. Lorber was in bed.

"'What's the matter now, Lorber?' asked the adjuster. 'Why don't you get up? If you would stay in bed all the rest of your life, y'understand, you wouldn't get it another cent from the company, ain't it?"

"'That's all right, too,' replied Lorber, 'aber when a feller runs a gambling-house and woiks all night, he must got to get his sleep in the daytime, ain't it?'"

Louie's eyes gleamed joyously and he shook his head from side to side as he contemplated what a few sprained ankles and broken legs might cost his old enemy Epstein.

After he had closed his delicatessen for the night, Louie's curiosity led him to walk around the corner to take a look at Epstein's coal-hole.

He touched the cover gingerly with his foot and sure enough it rocked. He walked to the end of the block and on his way back, he tried the cover again. He had all he could to do to resist the temptation to step right on it and suffer the consequences at Epstein's expense.

Three times the next day Finkelstone walked past Epstein's house to assure himself that the loose coal-cover was still there and each time a resolve he had already partially formed grew stronger.

At five o'clock, Benny, the boy, started out with the orders to be delivered in the neighborhood. Louie watched him as he opened the door.

"Never mind, Benny," he called, his mind now fully made up, "give me that basket: I would deliver them goods myself."

The boy handed him the basket and Louie started out.

As he neared 63, he was trembling in every limb. Approaching the coal-chute, he quickened his pace, but as he reached the dangerous cover his courage failed him and he stepped over it instead of upon it.

Ashamed of his cowardice, Finkelstone would have turned back but at once realized that if he were observed his action would look suspicious. He continued on his way therefore and delivered his orders, fully resolved however to carry out his purpose on his way back.

A few minutes later as he neared the coal-chute again, his empty basket slung across his shoulder, he quickened his pace, tightly shut his eyes and stepped boldly out. To his surprise nothing happened, although as his foot landed on the cover he felt it sway and rock.

Retracing his steps as though he had forgotten something, Louie shut his eyes again and walked rapidly towards the coal-cover.

Uttering a loud cry as he felt his leg descending into the chute, Finkelstone waved his arms frantically in an instinctive effort to save himself, but it was too late. Down the coal-hole his leg shot, following the curve of the chute in a manner no human leg was ever meant to bend, and then something snapped.

"Oi gewoldt! My leg is broke!" yelled Louie, almost fainting from fright and pain.

"It's Louie, the delicatessen man," shouted onlookers in the outskirts of the crowd which gathered as they caught a glimpse of the unfortunate man in the coal-chute, and while a policeman pulled him out of the hole and then went to summon an ambulance, several busy-bodies hastened around to Finkelstone's store to spread the news of the accident to Mrs. Finkelstone. There they learned, however, that she had been away all day and no one knew just where she was to be found.

"That's the thoid poison hoited down that coal-hole: something ought to be done about it!" Finkelstone heard a woman protest as they bundled him into the ambulance, and the words were like music in his ears.

"It's Sol Epstein's house, what used to run Finkelstone's delicatessen," volunteered another.

"Such a hard-luck house! It's a wonder he wouldn't of sold it!" commented a third.

"It's a wonder he wouldn't anyway have that coal-hole fixed! Does he want everyone should break his neck for the sake of a few cents, uh?" demanded still another.

Finkelstone listened to them all and chuckled despite his pain.

"If a sprained ankle would cost him $1,000, I guess a genuwine broken leg would make him stand up and give notice all right, all right!" he gloated as he lay on the floor of the ambulance, and the reflection caused him so much merriment that the ambulance surgeon thinking his patient was becoming delirious leaned over and jabbed him with a hypodermic syringe to quiet his nerves.

That evening Mrs. Finkelstone visited her husband in the hospital. Before the nurse could restrain her she was at his bedside and had thrown her arms around his neck.

"Easy, easy, Sadie leben, I got it a broken leg!" cautioned the injured man, trying to free himself from his wife's embrace.

"My poor Louie! I thought you was dead already! But I got it a good news for you, Louie. Popper and me we put it another one under that lowlife Epstein!"

"You did, Sadie leben? That was a good woik, but I put one under him myself. Foist tell me what you done it."

"Well, a couple weeks go, popper heard it that Epstein was having such a hard luck mit a house he owned it, mit law-cases and things, and it made him so crazy he was willing to sell for a song. Well, Louie, you know how smart popper was and when he heard Epstein was so crazy to sell, he goes to woik and offers him just half what the property is woith and before that lowlife knew what he was doing popper got him to sign it a contract. This morning, Louie, I went by the lawyer's office and the papers was signed and everything. Therefore, Louie, so soon you would get out from the hospital, we would right away move into the house, ain't it?"

"And what was the number from the house, Sadie?" asked Louie, apprehensively.

"The number, sagt er! What difference would it make the number, Louie? You ain't superstitious, are you?"

"No, Sadie, I ain't superstitious, y'understand, only I got it an idee some numbers would be luckier for me as others."

"Well, the number was 63, Louie—right around the corner from the store."

"Oi gewoldt! Such a number you should buy it! You didn't put one under Epstein: you've gone to woik and put one under me!"

The TEST

By Frances Harmer

MARION DARRELL dropped her book. A hurried step on the porch outside brought her to her feet. Quick as she was, the intruder was quicker. Walter Murray staggered in, throwing the door to behind him, and leaning against it, as he stared at her with wild eyes.

The girl stared back.

"Harry found you," she cried, in a low voice, tense with anxiety. "Walter! You didn't fight?"

The boy—he was twenty-two—nodded. Then he searched the pretty, dainty room, with his staring eyes, as if detectives lurked in every shadow.

Marion ran to him. The "mother for the man she loves," said to be in every woman, was certainly in her.

"He hurt you—the big brute, the bully!" she cried, with a sob. "My poor boy! Walter! Don't look like that! Walter!"

She backed away suddenly. There was no need of any word from him.

"Walter!"

She whispered his name now, in frozen horror. He held out his hands to her, pleading in agony. But as she still drew away, he dropped on his knees in front of her.

"I didn't—didn't mean it!" he gasped. "He struck me. I hit back. He knocked me down. I tripped him up. He fell beside me. I got up. He caught at me, and pulled at my watch. It came off in his hand. He got up, and opened it at your picture! He knocked me down, again, and knelt on my chest. He took the picture out, and tossed the watch away. I struggled, and threw him off. We fought—and once I got on top—and rolled him to the slope."

Marion caught at a chair back and leaned against it gasping.

"The slope!" she moaned.

Walter knelt up against the chair, looking at her with bloodshot eyes.

"Marion, I never meant that! I had but one thought—to get your picture back!"

He rose, looking fearfully round him.

"It's gone to the bottom with him," he muttered. "He's got it."

Marion caught at his hands. Then she snatched her own away, with a cry—for they were stained with blood!

The boy looked at her.

"The brambles tore my hands, when I broke off a branch," he said. "I tried to save him, Marion—I held it out. But he—he never rose! He rolled—down the slope—and—he never rose!"

Then, with a low cry, he dropped again to the floor. The girl bent over him.

"We—we must think of you," she said, hoarsely. "Your sleeves—they're wet?"

"I tried to reach him," reiterated Walter.

Marion turned to the telephone. Her lover, crouching on the floor, watched her and listened. As she telephoned to his boarding house, as she explained that he was staying the night at her father's house, and wanted his suit case sent by a special messenger, her plan of action grew clear to him. When she turned from the receiver, he was calmer.

"You understand?" she glanced at the clock. "It's nine now. You've been with me, since seven! Whatever happens—you've been with me—since seven."

"I met Carston at eight—near the wood," he answered, despairingly. "We spoke."

Marion's face grew whiter. Then she looked at the floor, and gave a little cry. Water and mud,

"Don t answer" she cried, but it was too late. His words rang across hers from his wet boots and trousers, had stained the Persian rug.

"Take off your shoes," she commanded. "Quick! No, don't stop to wonder what I mean. Take them off!"

With quick, nervous fingers, she brushed the mud from them, using the corner of the wet rug, for this purpose. Then her face lightened.

"We are alone," she cried, exultingly, "I forgot I had let the servants both go out. Wait here for me."

She put the shoes in the oven, lighting the gas stove in the kitchen. Then, aided by the bewildered boy, she took the telltale rug, and threw it into a little room opening from the hall. In its place, she put one from the dining room. One or two other changes of furniture made this less noticeable. By the time she had completed these alterations, the shoes, while damp, were not noticeably so. The suit case arrived, with a complete change of raiment. Repairing to the little closet off the hall, the boy put on his business suit, and packed the muddy and stained garments in the suitcase, which he left behind him. Marion locked the closet door, and slipped the key inside her dress.

She took up the book she had been reading, and laid it open, on her knee. Walter, obeying her glance, sat on the lounge near her. The clock struck the quarter past nine as her father strode into the room.

Marion dared not look at her lover. There was no need of any word from her father, who stood there, sternly regarding them, to tell her that he knew the worst.

"I thought I should find you here," he said, as Walter rose limply to his feet. "I have telephoned for the officer!"

As Marion's courage—she had always been afraid of her father—waned, Walter's waxed.

"Officers?" he said, with a smile, meeting the angry eyes under frowning brows that glared at him. "I've a clear record, sir. If the bank books are wrong, I've nothing to do with the errors."

Marion watched her father. Just the faintest gleam of surprise, of doubt, on his face, made her own heart full of courage.

"What are you talking about, father?" she asked, quietly. "Walter's been with me, all the evening."

Mr. Darrell turned to her quickly.

"Then how comes it that this!"— He held out to her a torn, tiny photograph of herself—"was in your cousin's dead hand?"

Marion gave a cry.

"Dead?" she said, recovering herself. She leaned towards Walter, who put his arm around her.

"That is mine," explained the boy, looking at the torn fragment in Mr. Darrell's hand. "It was in my watch, which—I lost—this afternoon."

Marion's fingers, closing on his, gave him courage, for her sake.

"He was just telling me about it?" she corroborated, faintly. "But—father—what do you say—of Harry?"

"His body has been taken from the river," replied her father.

A ring at the front door silenced him. He turned to answer it, and the two were left alone for a minute.

"There's no hope, no hope," said the boy. "Why was I coward and fool enough to come here—to drag you into it? I was mad."

"The moment you have thrown father and Sergeant Lester off the track, you must go," she said. "They'll question you—they'll try to incriminate you—but they daren't arrest you against my word that you've been here to dinner!"

She flung her arms round him.

"Keep your head, through all the Sergeant asks you," she counselled, under her breath. "Here, take this."

She put her little pocket book into his hand.

"Go to New York, and watch your chance to get abroad—before any one can see Carston, or learn from the servants that you were not here to dinner—or learn from your landlady that I telephoned for those clothes."

She turned away from him, and sat down at the piano.

But, after one chord, she remembered that her cousin was dead—and let her hands fall on her lap. She whispered a last caution as the steps of the Sergeant and her father halted at the door.

"Stay with your back to the light!"

The next moment, she was smiling faintly at the short, stout man, in uniform, whom her father brought in.

"You're bearing up under your cousin's death," was his first remark. Then she knew she had overdone her part.

The Sergeant eyed Walter, who rose, and nodded to him.

"Kindly sit here," said the official, indicating the center table. He placed the reading lamp in the middle, and turned out all the other lights, as Walter put chairs. The four sat down at the table, Mr. Darrell opposite his daughter, the Sergeant facing Walter.

"My father is feeling this terribly," began Marion, plunging into the fray. "He was fond of—my cousin. He has made an unfounded accusation. Mr. Murray had no need to quarrel with—my cousin, because I had already refused him—and am engaged to—"

She held out her hand to her lover, without concluding the sentence.

"That's all very fine," said the officer, briskly. "You probably know that we've no warrant, and must have something to go upon to get one. That something will be Walter Murray's confession, which I propose to get before we rise from this table."

"By what right?" began Walter, but the officer held up a warning finger.

"If you're an innocent man," he snapped, "you can have no objection to having that innocence proved. Kindly put your hands on the table. You, too, Miss Darrell."

They obeyed. The Sergeant smiled, grimly.

"Yours are trembling, Miss Darrell," he almost purred his triumph. "Now, I want to ask two questions: then you may go, if you wish to."

Making the Common HOUSEHOLD ACIDS WORK for YOU

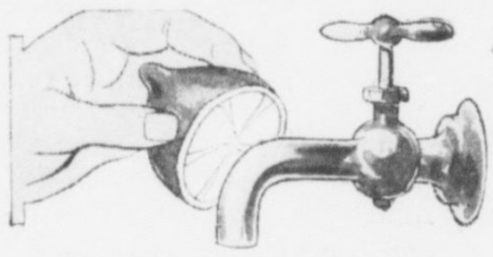
By Margaret Soundstrom

THAT the art of good housekeeping and science of chemistry are very nearly related, is a fact that many housekeepers do not appreciate as fully as they might. If they did, many a weary woman would find in the operations of her daily toil, both in the kitchen and in other parts of the house, much that would relieve the monotony of house work. Unthinkingly she daily performs a continual series of chemical experiments which prove the great scientific laws governing life.

What is it that goes on in those pots and pans when the dinner is cooking, or how is it that the hot water boiler suddenly becomes bright and clean when rubbed with some simple looking liquid that is kept in a tightly corked bottle high up on the shelf?

It is not our purpose to treat the many phases of household chemistry, but to return to the bottle just mentioned, which must be kept high up out of the way of the children. It suggests the nature and use of some of the acids which are daily used in the average household.

The liquid in the bottle, as clear and harmless looking as water, is oxalic acid, purchased probably in a five-cent package at a nearby drug store. This acid, which is very poisonous, is sold in the form of white crystals which readily dissolve in water. To use it, put the contents of a five-cent package in a quart bottle, fill the bottle with hot water and allow it to cool slowly. Brass and copper can be quickly and effectively cleaned with this acid because it acts chemically on the tarnish, removing it instantly. Tarnish is a deposit on a metal caused by the chemical action of the oxygen and dampness of the atmosphere. When the acid is applied to this tarnish it dissolves the deposit and leaves the surface clear. After the tarnish is removed, every bit of the acid must be rubbed off with a dry cloth on which have been dropped a few drops of sweet oil, else dangerous green salts will be formed on the metal which might be thoughtlessly rubbed off on the hands.



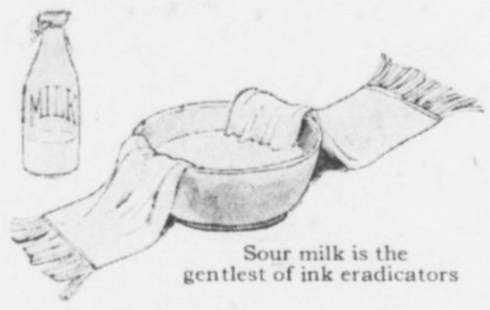
Clean the brass faucet with a lemon

Oxalic acid is also used for removing ink-stains on carpets, table covers, and even white materials. There are many kinds of inks, some containing iron compounds and some aniline and allied substances. Oxalic acid will not remove aniline ink-stains, but it will remove the iron. As it is impossible for the average person to tell what sort of ink has been spilled, it is always well to give the acid a trial. Fill a medicine dropper, and apply it drop by drop; if the stain contains iron it will disappear. To neutralize the further action of the acid on the cloth the material should then be dipped in ammonia and water (one part ammonia to ten of water), and then rinsed in clear water. If the material is colored and the acids have caused it to fade, the ammonia and water will doubtless restore the color.

Carbolic acid both prevents and cures sickness

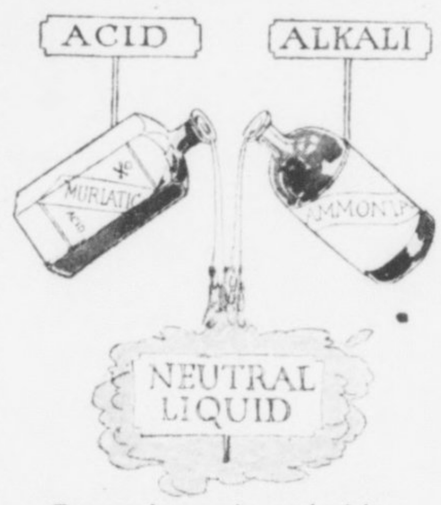
Like oxalic acid in its effect on brass and copper, is the acid in vinegar known as acetic acid, produced by the alcoholic fermentation of the sugar in the cider, and by those minute organisms which form the "mother" of vinegar.

For the cleaning of metals, it is better to buy a small quantity of the pure acetic acid and dilute it with water (one of acid to twenty of water), rather than use vinegar the other ingredients of which often leave a discoloration. After cleaning brass and other metals with this acid, the surface should be thoroughly washed with ammonia and water. To clean brass water faucets such as are frequently found in kitchen sinks, ordinary vinegar will do very well, care being taken to rinse it all off afterwards.



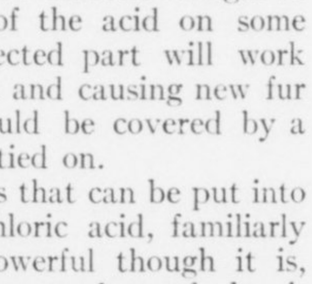
Sour milk is the gentlest of ink eradicators

Acids as disinfectants do not seem to suggest themselves very much to the average housewife because there are so many profusely advertised alkalies put up and ready for use. These all have their value, but equally effective, and convenient always to have on hand are one or two of the standard acids. The intelligent use of carbolic acid, in disinfecting white fabrics, colored materials, metals, woods, and the like, would be of great saving to the wife and mother who has had to deal with a case of contagious disease. Used for disinfecting bedding and bed clothes it kills the germ spores in their vegetative stage and if used in its proper strength (one of acid to twenty of water), it will not injure fabrics in the least. All bed clothes and clothing from an infectious disease should be immersed in a bath of water and carbolic and then sent to the laundry. If by chance the family cat is also included in the sick list and shows signs of mange, two or three drops of the acid on some vaseline rubbed into the affected part will work wonders in healing the skin and causing new fur to grow. The vaseline should be covered by a clean linen rag and securely tied on.



Damage by one is repaired by the other

One of the most useful acids that can be put into use in the home is hydrochloric acid, familiarly known as muriatic acid. Powerful though it is, this acid is one of the most commonly used chemicals in the industrial world; why not then take advantage of its usefulness in the daily operations of the home? It is a most familiar sight to all housekeepers to see their white porcelain sinks, tubs, and hoppers discolored with yellowish brown stains, which they vainly try to scrub off with sand soap or a washing powder. The brown stains are caused by the iron in the water supply, and, as this iron is oxidized on to the porcelain by the action of the atmosphere, abrasive materials (sand soap, and so forth), while they may take off some of it, do not accomplish their purpose nearly as well as hydrochloric acid which acts chemically on the iron deposit and completely removes the stains. To clean such spots take one part concentrated hydrochloric acid to ten parts water,—about two tablespoons to twenty tablespoons of water is a good amount—and with a small dish mop, wash off the stains with the liquid. Rinse with clear water and then wash around wherever the acid has been with some washing soda dissolved in water to neutralize the acid and prevent any injurious action which it might have on the waste pipes. This acid should not touch the hands, as it is injurious to the skin.



Keep the acids away from iron

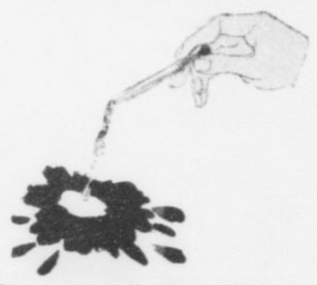
Keep all the acids away from the children

From this use of hydrochloric acid it is very evident that it is an enemy of iron rust wherever it may be found, therefore in no part of the house is it more useful than in the laundry, where spots of rust will make their appearance from one or another of many causes. To remove these spots spread the stained portion of material over a bowl containing one quart of water in which one teaspoonful of borax has been dissolved. With a medicine dropper allow the undiluted hydrochloric acid to drop in the spot, one drop at a time until the rust brightens, then dip the material quickly into the bowl of borax and water. If the spot is not entirely gone, repeat the some process over again until it disappears, then rinse in clear water several times.

The acid in lemons, called citric acid, can be used in many ways in the household, for removing tarnish from metals and stains on bric-a-brac and picture frames, especially brass of delicate workmanship. The use of lemon juice should always be followed by rinsing with ammonia and water. Because the juice contains a natural acid it is both convenient and harmless though great care should be taken to dispose of the lemons as soon as they have been used. Citric acid is often used as a substitute for lemon juice in making lemonade as well as for lemon flavorings in cooking.

Milk has long been resorted to as a remedy for removing stains though most people are so impatient to get all the ink out at once that they waste a great deal of milk without getting very good results. If ink has been spilled on a fabric remove all the ink possible with a spoon, and then use a small sponge. Take a medium size bowl or deep dish and put the stained portion of the material in it, then pour on enough milk to entirely cover it over. Let it stand for at least an hour and if the milk is very discolored pour it off and replenish with a fresh supply. Put the bowl and the stained fabric in a warm place such as would be selected for raising bread dough and leave it there until the milk has soured. The chemical action of the lactic acid ferment in the milk, as it sours, will have removed the ink much more effectively than if quantities of fresh milk had been used. If the stain is not entirely gone the process can be repeated until it disappears entirely when it will be found that the fibres of the fabric have remained uninjured.

The souring of milk suggests to many women nothing further than the idea that the milk has spoiled and should be thrown away. Some thrifty housewives, especially those who live in country districts, use this milk with soda in baking their gingerbread. But the souring of milk, caused by lactic fermentation, produces lactic acid for which there are innumerable uses. Sour milk therefore should never be despised in the household; the acid in it is valuable to the health and if there is no one willing to drink it just as it is, a very palatable beverage can be made by adding carbonated water and a little chopped ice.



Drop oxalic acid on ink-stains

GUINEVERE'S LOVER

By ELINOR GLYN

Author of "Three Weeks" and "Why!"

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS—Guinevere, the young wife of the aged and selfish General Bohun, in spite of her youth and beauty has led a lonely and narrow married life. Her little son, Algernon, is much like his father, and both neglect her. They have just moved into the ancestral country seat of the Bohuns when Guinevere's elder sister, Letitia, arrives and tells her about Sir Hugh Dremont, a neighbor, whom they soon meet. Guinevere feels a powerful attraction for Sir Hugh which has developed into love on both sides when Guinevere obtains permission from her crabbed husband to visit her sister in London. Sir Hugh devotes himself to Guinevere as much as is possible without causing comment. In this they are aided by Letitia. At last the short period of bliss is over and Guinevere is compelled to return to her home. General Bohun is unexpectedly sent away on a long diplomatic mission which permits Sir Hugh to visit Guinevere daily and the perilous intimacy to further ripen. The lovers fight with what seems to be the inevitable and Guinevere sends Sir Hugh away time and again only to have him come back bound closer to her than ever.

"Your mother has been on the Hermione with me," he said with imperturbable calm

Chapter XXI

IT is the first week in August now and we are all at Cowes—Humphrey and Algernon and I on the little yawl, the Guinevere, and Hugh on his large racing schooner the Hermione—at least the Hermione is here but Hugh has been in London today and returns with Letitia and Langthorpe tonight.

We have spent all July yachting, Humphrey and I, with only old Sir John Kaird, but Hugh has often been near us and sailed with us, or we with him, and now we have just anchored in Cowes roads for the week.

I have been feverishly happy, I never allow myself to think, I stifle every suggestion of the past or the future, I live breathlessly from day to day.

It seems as though the forces beyond were aiding us, and my husband himself seems to make everything smooth, and throw us easily into each other's company.

"It will do her good, Dremont," he has even said, "buffet her about a bit, and put some heart into her, get along!"

And these are almost the only times we have been absolutely quite alone, but there have been many different hours of sitting on the deck together and talking in happy peace, while Humphrey and Sir John moved within view.

Algernon, who came two days ago, is perfectly enchanted with everything. He is absolutely fearless always, and ready to chance any danger if he can only find one to indulge in. He seems to have grown and have got to look older even since Easter. And in his cabin when the steward first unpacked his things I perceived several photographs of comic opera stars and one with "Rosie" scrawled across it. What does this mean, I wonder? He stayed in London with his friend Burbridge for two nights at the Morvaine house before joining us here and I suppose went to the theatre. Burbridge has left Eton and goes up to Oxford in the autumn. I dare not tell Humphrey of course, and yet it worries me to see these photographs, though there is nothing the least serious in their suggestion. They merely show that the indifference to female blandishment which was apparent in the hunting season has been thawed, and it is absurd to look at Algernon any longer as a child.

Dressed for dinner in his immaculate clothes he might be almost twenty years old. He is over six feet tall and not too reedy. He is in the eleven now and will play at Lords next year; this is a tremendous triumph for one so young. Tomorrow is Saturday when all the world arrives at Cowes, and we shall land and go into the Squadron Gardens, and there I shall see Hugh again, and Letitia, they arrive too late for us to meet tonight.

There is weeping rain today and I do not know how to write, but I must try so as to collect all my courage, for something terrible has happened and the joy and desire of living is over for me, and I must face an existence now which seems more cruel than death.

I must live, that is the price that circumstances now oblige me to pay for breaking the law of man, and whatever comes I must bear it with a calm face.

Last night, the night of the fireworks, we all dined on shore at "Palestine," where a merry party are staying, and there was one gallant Irishman who began immediately at dinner to make love to me and this drove Hugh perfectly mad; he was sitting opposite and Humphrey on the same side of the table. There was no mistaking the purport of the Irishman's speeches and his attitude and whole manner expressed the most elaborate devotion. The last two days have been extremely difficult for Hugh and me, we have not once had a chance to be for an instant alone, and as ever, the gall of these restrictions has acted upon him to produce the same passionate unrest.

His face at dinner was thunderous with jealous fury. I spent a time of terror in case Humphrey or any of the rest of the party would notice it. The moment we had finished, we all moved out into the garden together to have our coffee quickly so as to get back to the Squadron Gardens in time for the fireworks. And the amourous Irishman was making his way to me when Hugh deliberately stepped in front of him and sat down in the chair, and with supreme insolence then apologized to Captain O'Gorman, but did not attempt to give up the seat.

His eyes were blazing as he whispered to me:

"Guinevere, I will not bear it. You belong to me, how dare you let that brute sprawl over you at dinner!"

And for the first time in our knowledge of one another I fired up and answered haughtily:

"And how dare you speak to me like that?"

His face quivered with angry pain, while he drew in his breath and shut his lips like a vise. I repented instantly, it was just the Ferrer's spirit in me which arose at being spoken to by my lover so sharply, it was not that I resented his assumption of authority. I admitted and gloried in that.

"Hugh," I whispered contritely, "I am sorry, dearest, please forgive me, I did not mean that. Of course you have a right to scold me if you choose."

His stern face changed immediately and reckless of all outsiders' possible observation he bent over me with an expression of deep emotion.

"I don't want to scold you darling," he said in my ear. "I am simply wild with the torment of things. I have grown to love you absolutely to madness lately, far more than ever, and it drives me completely crazy when I see another man making love to you, and I know that I have not the right openly to interfere, and that a few whispers in the Gardens or a snatched kiss in the dark, are all the crumbs of comfort I shall get perhaps for days and days. Guinevere, I have been so awfully unhappy this week, I do not know how to bear my life."

An icy cold pain stabbed me. This is the first time Hugh has ever said that the situation is causing his existence to be darkened. I could not speak for a moment, it hurt me so. If our love was bringing him torture then we ought to part again I felt.

Before I found my words, a general move was made, all to get into the flys which were waiting, the first rocket had gone up. And seized by Humphrey I was separated from Hugh and he did not rejoin me again until we were standing just outside the entrance to the Castle platform in a blaze of light of a set piece of the King and Queen.

He came up behind me and he whispered, his voice vibrating with passion:

"Guinevere, the general is now going back to play bridge at 'Palestine'—Algernon is talking to the Welbrooks in that jolly young party and the moment this glare is over they will all go and listen to the music as they did last night, without his joining us. And the music does not finish until eleven o'clock as you know. Directly everyone turns back toward the band, say good night to our hostess, put your scarf over your head and go down to the landing stage, my launch will be waiting, very few of the other yachts' boats are there as yet. I shall already be in it and we will go off to the Hermione and have an hour in peace. Then I will take you to the Guinevere and return in time to pick up Algernon, telling him you were tired and went straight on board. The Guinevere's boat is to wait for the general."

He did not remain for my reply, but stepped in among the crowd and I was too moved and miserable to think of disobeying him.

Letitia was nowhere about, she was dining on another yacht, and had not landed at all to-night. There was nothing particularly compromising in my going off from the steps in Hugh's launch, it had taken us all often before, and I might really have been returning to our boat. But still it was the first time my lover has ever chanced anything for me. The passion in him must certainly have risen to a terrible height.

But the lights and the crowd and the night generated excitement, and I felt I did not care what happened, I must see and speak to Hugh in peace.

It reminded me of the old day in Victoria Station when I met him to go to Richmond Park, as I walked down the squadron landing stage to the launch, and there got in with what calmness I could. Hugh was waiting for me, and we flew over the smooth waters, the Hermione was lying fairly close in and we seemed to arrive in no time; we had not spoken a word as Hugh steered.

"Lord and Lady Langthorpe returned yet?" he asked cheerily of the first mate who helped us on board, and "Not yet, Sir Hugh," was the expected answer he got, and we went beyond the deck house where the comfortable chairs are grouped, and where the sailors, when the ship is at anchor, never come at this hour of the night. There in the shadows Hugh clasped me in his arms and then he spoke, his dear voice deep with emotion.

"I am perfectly mad, Guinevere, I love you so, it is reckless of me to make you come here perhaps, but I am beyond that, I cannot bear any more torment to-night."

I felt I understood this, and oh, it was so divine to be with him again after our checks and frets. We sat there watching the stars blissfully content at last, all ruffled sensations between us smoothed now in the happiness of being together alone, and never has Hugh been more adorably tender and fond and worshipping, and never have I loved him with more profound depth. We seemed to be at the zenith of joy, all shadows forgotten and all fears lulled to rest. I shall always remember the beauty of the scene around us, with the illuminated fairy yachts, and the glorious summer starlit sky above.

"Oh, soul of me," Hugh whispered, "if we could sink down into the dark blue waters now and stay forever thus together for eternity, how good it would be," and I sighed a fond "yes."

But we were startled from this exquisite dreaming by hearing the echoes of "God Save the King" wafted over the still sea from the gardens, and we rose quickly to our feet.

The band was over and by no possible hurrying could I be back on the Guinevere and Hugh at the steps before Algernon would be standing there waiting for him. Hugh would have to invent an excuse. A chill of foreboding crept over me, I do not know why, and we both hastened into the waiting launch and made all speed to our yawl, and there, leaning over the rail, was—Algernon, who hailed us.

"Is that you, mother? Where on earth have you been? They told me you had gone in Sir Hugh's launch. I came in our boat soon after you, my beastly nose began to bleed and I hadn't a second handkerchief." Hugh followed me up the gangway on to the deck and there my heart seemed to stop beating for a second, for when the light of the lantern fell on my son's face it seemed as though a suspicious sardonic gleam lurked in his eyes.

It was then that Hugh's nerve and sang froid showed itself.

"Your mother has been on the Hermioue with me, quite safe," he said with imperturbable calm. "She was so weary of standing about at the fireworks that I took her there to have some coffee in peace," and then he turned to me.

"Don't think of remaining up for me now, Lady Bohun, since Algernon is here. If he isn't very tired, I'll stay with him and have my cigar while I wait for the general. I want to settle about sailing round to Ventnor to-morrow and we ought to arrange things to-night. We will have to make such an early start."

His manner was the perfection of naturalness, neither too effusive nor too stiff, and we said a friendly good-night, and kissing Algernon, I disappeared below, leaving my lover and my son alone together, there under the stars.

And I knew when I sank trembling into the sofa in my cabin that Hugh had saved me for this time, but that nothing could ever remove suspicion from Algernon's Bohun mind, if ever it had occasion to be aroused again; no, I was face to face with that other awful side of the case, not the tarnishing of my own soul this time, from the stooping to dissimulate to my husband, but the even more terrible aspect of destroying my son's belief in his mother and raising doubts of her in his heart.

Then, like a ghastly flash of lightning blasting my brain, came the realization that the end had come, the very end, and with a moan I fell forward upon the cabin floor.

The long, drawn-out anguish of these awful days. It rained incessantly without a breath of wind the whole of the Saturday until late in the afternoon, and we were not able to go for our sail. Hugh came on board in the morning early to consult with Humphrey as to what to do, but being aware my husband had already decided not to try to start, I did not go up on deck. I felt too broken and feeble after my night of misery to be able to face Hugh, knowing the agonizing things I should have to say to him, when next we could be alone. It was better that he should be able to be natural with Humphrey and Algernon once more before he knew; I heard them all laughing and swearing at the rain, then the noise of another boat's arriving, and Algernon's penetrating voice asking if he might accept the invitation the Welbrooks had just sent to go on board their steam yacht, and steam with them round the Island and stay and dine. They could have such jolly fun and did not mind the rain.

I put my cheek against his strong, old hand and rubbed it, but I could not speak

Humphrey assented, and Algernon gave a joyous shout, and clambering down the companion burst into my cabin with hardly a knock.

"You are lazy, mum," he exclaimed, "lying on that sofa. The Welbrooks have asked me to go with them for the day, and father has said I may. I haven't a moment, good-bye," and he gave me a hurried kiss and rushed off, and soon I heard the splash of oars and knew he was on his way.

And I felt, as he was gone, I must make the chance to see Hugh somehow.

I got up and went on deck and called out good-morning, and Hugh and Humphrey came from the bows and joined me in the little deck house, descending with me to the saloon.

"Is Letitia up yet?" I asked. "I do want to see her to-day. We have all been too busy to have a word, the whole week, but in this awful wet she can't want to do anything—will you take me back with you, Sir Hugh?"

"Yes, do," said Humphrey, "and then drop me ashore. I shall go and have a game of bridge at 'Palestine' and ask for some luncheon after. The sea is sickening in this weather."

And so we started, the launch going on with Humphrey, after taking Hugh and me to the Hermione. Letitia was not up, of course, or even awake, Langthorpe told us; he was comfortably smoking in the deck house, with all the morning papers, so Hugh and I went down alone into the saloon. It is perfectly arranged, with its white paneling and blue curtains, and it has a piano and plenty of light.

"I want to play to you, Hugh," I said, after he had folded me in his arms. There was an anxious questioning look in his dear eyes, as they gazed into mine. I could not speak of terrible things yet with certainly two hours of undisturbed peace in front of us, and I could not talk ordinarily of other matters, and with my heart aching and sick with pain to make music was the best way to comfort us both.

"Guinevere," Hugh said, as he opened the piano for me, "I know, I feel there is something, darling," and then he seized me wildly in his arms again. "Oh, dear!" he whispered brokenly, "I am afraid, to think what it is. Yes, play to me, dear."

And he went and flung himself into the corner of the great, deep wall sofa, where he could watch my face, sideways, and there he sat, his tall form crouched together, his attitude constrained.

I played and played for an hour, perhaps, every sort of angel's song, and my own soul floated up in the divine sounds, and I seemed to see a bright light beyond the awful abyss of pain.

And at last I played him a new thing I had just got—a modern thing, but one of astonishing meaning and pathos, and all this time Hugh had not stirred beyond a passionate clasping of his hands once or twice. Then I played the "Farewell," and the tears gathered in my eyes and ran in big drops down my cheeks.

And my dear lover rose and came and knelt beside me, and drew me close.

"Ah, my beloved!" he said, his voice so hoarse with suffering it did not sound like his own. "That is what you mean, Guinevere. I knew it would come, last night, directly I saw Algernon's face."

"You understand, then," I murmured, with a sob in my throat. "Hugh, we could not love like we do if our souls were so unfine that they could face—the probability of—that."

"Yes—" he said, in anguish. "And to think that, if I had not let passion conquer me last night, the necessity to part might never have arisen," and then he groaned as though his very being was wrung with agony.

"Hugh," I sobbed, "my lover, oh, Heaven above, what can I do to bring you comfort. Hugh, this is breaking my heart."

He controlled himself then, and leaned his head against my shoulder, as he knelt there, and once more encircled me with his arms.

"Guinevere, my darling, must it be so?" and all the pleading of the world seemed melted in his dear voice. "I will promise, I will faithfully promise never again to give way to anything that could create a situation that you need fear. I have not the pluck to face again the awful agony of parting from you. You don't, you can't know what you mean to me, more than anything in heaven or earth. You can judge of the colossal importance you are, because I am a man, with the strongest passions, as you know, and accustomed all my life to gratify them when I fancied, though I am not altogether a brute. And I am willing to crush them all out, to live like a

"But I am ahead of my story. When the great exodus from the cities around San Francisco Bay began, and while the telephones were still working, I talked with my brother. I told him this flight from the cities was insanity, that there were no symptoms of the plague in me, and that the thing for us to do was to isolate ourselves and our relatives in some safe place. We decided on the Chemistry Building, at the university, and we planned to lay in a supply of provisions, and by force of arms to prevent any other persons from forcing their presence upon us after we had retired to our refuge.

"All this being arranged, my brother begged me to stay in my own house for at least twenty-four hours more, on the chance of the plague developing in me. To this I agreed, and he promised to come for me the next day. We talked on over the details of the provisioning and the defending of the Chemistry Building until the telephone died. It died in the midst of our conversation. That evening there were no electric lights, and I was alone in my house in the darkness. No more newspapers were being printed, so I had no knowledge of what was taking place outside. I heard sounds of rioting and of pistol shots, and from my windows I could see the glare on the sky of some conflagration in the direction of Oakland. It was a night of terror. I did not sleep a wink. A man—why and how I do not know—was killed on the sidewalk in front of the house. I heard the rapid reports of an automatic pistol, and a few minutes later a wounded wretch crawled up to my door, moaning and crying out for help. Arming myself with two automatics, I went to him. By the light of a match I ascertained that while he was dying of the bullet wounds, at the same time the plague was on him. I fled indoors, whence I heard him moan and cry out for half an hour longer.

"In the morning, my brother came to me. I had gathered into a hand-bag what things of value I purposed taking, but when I saw his face I knew that he would never accompany me to the Chemistry Building The plague was on him. He intended shaking my hand, but I went back hurriedly before him.

"'Look at yourself in the mirror,' I commanded.

"He did so, and at sight of his scarlet face, the color deepening as he looked at it, he sank down nervously in a chair.

"'I've got it!' he said. 'Don't come near me. I am a dead man.'

"Then the convulsions seized him. He was two hours in dying, and he was conscious to the last, complaining about the coldness and loss of sensation in his feet, his calves, his thighs, until at last it was his heart, and he was dead.

"That was the way the Scarlet Death slew. I caught up my hand bag and fled. The sights in the streets were terrible. One stumbled on bodies everywhere. Some were not yet dead. And even as you looked you saw men sink down with the death fastened upon them. There were numerous fires burning in Berkeley, while Oakland and San Francisco were apparently being swept away by vast conflagrations. The smoke of the burning filled the heavens, so that the midday was as gloomy twilight, and, in the shifts of wind, sometimes the sun shone through dimly, a dull red orb. Truly, my grandsons, it was like the last days of the end of the world.

"There were numerous stalled motor-cars, showing that the gasolene and the engine supplies of the garage had given out. I remember one such car. A man and a woman lay back dead in the seats, and on the pavement near it were two more women and a child. Strange and terrible sights there were on every hand. People slipped by silently, furtively, like ghosts—white-faced women carrying infants in their arms; fathers leading children by the hand; singly and in couples, and in families—all fleeing out of the city of death. Some carried supplies of food, others blankets and valuables, and there were many who carried nothing.

"There was a grocery store—a place where food was sold. The man to whom it belonged—I knew him well—a quiet, sober, but stupid and obstinate fellow, was defending it. The windows and doors had been broken in, but he, inside, hiding behind the counter, was discharging his pistol at a number of men on the sidewalk who were breaking in. In the entrance were several bodies—of men, I decided, whom he had killed earlier in the day. Even as I looked on from a distance, I saw one of the robbers break the windows of the adjoining store, a place where shoes were sold, and deliber-

She rested against his shoulder, passionately animate as a bag of salt

PAPA Peduncle was in a bilious mood. Goldilocks, who toyed with a visible writer in the front office downtown, had refused his invitation to luncheon that afternoon. The reason had been a previous engagement with the senior partner, who had a gold-plated limousine and could take her to Cherry's. The junior's limit was a walk around the corner to the little Italian restaurant, and Peduncle was the junior.

"Woman was modest and virtuous," said Peduncle sourly, forgetting that Mamma Peduncle and daughter Daisy were within earshot, "when her husband rebuked a wanton glance with his war club and for infidelity slit her throat. Now, well she is emancipated."

"Ahem," said Mamma acidly, realizing that the remark was an inadvertence. "Now she too has learned to use the club and knife. Are you merely peeved about it, or WORRIED?"

Peduncle, coming to with great suddenness, gave her a startled glance, wondering if that were only a chance remark. Women are so confoundedly keen.

"I was deploring the passing of the modest violet girl," craftily declared Peduncle. Though somewhat expanded now, both physically and mentally, Mamma had been of the violet type. "Really, my dear, some of the sights I've seen lately—"

"It is a bad idea for a married man to cast his eyes around so carelessly," counseled his wife. "They might stick to one of those sights and cause you a lot of trouble."

Thereupon Peduncle sought refuge in silence.

"'The modest violet girl,'" mused Daisy, when she was alone in her room. "I wonder if there IS anything in that? I've tried everything else."

Daisy had a hungry hankering to hitch her young runabout to a rising star of the legal profession; and the hitching wasn't good. Every time she tried to hook the tugs, Blackstone shied away from the pole.

Blackstone was quick to note the change when next he called.

"Gloomy Gus!" he exclaimed, as Daisy, in a plain, high-necked gown of black, gave him her hand. "Is your bulldog dead, or did you shoot something bigger than clay pigeons?"

"Oh, no," she answered. "Do you like it, for a change."

"Quite becoming," he replied perfunctorily. He had not been among those who thought that Daisy overplayed her best feature—beautiful shoulders. "Ripping game Matty pitched to-day."

"Was it? I was so interested in my embroidery that I didn't read the paper."

"Help!" he wailed feebly. "Are you going into a decline or a needlework guild?"

"I'm giving up athletics for more womanly pursuits."

"Getting heavy on your feet?" he asked with brutal sarcasm.

Daisy bit her lip. The road to Violetville had stones in it.

Behind the Procession is--DUST

By Terrell Love Holliday

"You promised to teach me that new dance, 'The Chicken Flip,'" said Blackstone presently. "Shall I put a record in the gramophone?"

"Father thinks that is immodest," murmured Daisy primly.

"What makes you think that you are going to die?" asked the lawyer with mock solicitude.

"I HAVE changed," was the pensive admission.

"And why?" he demanded. "You were awfully sweet as you were."

Daisy flashed him a quick glance, wondering if she had made a mistake. Then, remembering that shrinking violets never looked directly at a man, cast her eyes modestly downward, simpering: "Oh, Mr. Blackstone!"

The old Daisy, he thought, would have smiled and said, perhaps: "That's a good opener. How's your follow-up system?"

To learn what would happen, he took her hand.

"Why, Mr. Blackstone," she breathed, blushing deeply and making a pretense of trying to withdraw it.

Once, he felt sure, she would have looked him squarely in the eye and said: "If you mean business, go ahead. But that is no plaything."

Having gone so far, he simply had to kiss her. He did—just once. He had never cared about kissing babies or dolls.

"Oh, Mr.—Henry—you mustn't," she protested and after a poor imitation of resistance, rested against his shoulder, quivering, passionately animate as a bag of salt.

There he sat, with his arms around her, and watched the clock while she told him about a sweet story she had read in the Ladies' Companion, and her new recipe for quince jelly. Half an hour earlier than usual he departed, unengaged.

"Blackstone's engagement to that dashing Whoopleigh girl is announced, I see," said Papa Peduncle. "By Jove! She's up to the minute, all right. She can box, play polo, lead a suffragette riot or discuss the fine points of safety pins at a mother's meeting, with equal adroitness. And how she dresses! Every gown's a gasp. But," he said, with a defiant glance at Mamma, "I don't blame her. It's a sin to hide such a figure as hers."

Without even massaging her face, Daisy flung herself upon what, despite her best efforts, remained her maidenly couch. "Undone," she sobbed. "Misguided by my own father. I should have known better. The only parade ever headed by a 'dead one' is a funeral procession."

ately set fire to it. I did not go to the groceryman's assistance. The time for such acts had already passed. Civilization was crumbling, and it was each for himself.

"I went away hastily, down a cross-street, and at the first corner saw another tragedy. Two men of the working class had caught a man and a woman with two children, and were robbing them. I knew the man by sight, though I had never been introduced to him. He was a poet whose verses I had long admired. Yet I did not go to his help, for at the moment I came upon the scene there was a pistol shot, and I saw him sinking to the ground. The woman screamed, and she was felled with a fist-blow by one of the brutes. I cried out threateningly, whereupon they discharged their pistols at me and I ran away around the corner. Here I was blocked by an advancing conflagration. The buildings on both sides were burning, and the street was filled with smoke and flame. From somewhere in that murk came a woman's voice calling for help. But I did not go to her. A man's heart turned to iron amid such scenes, and one heard all too many appeals for help.

Rub Lifebuoy Soap, briskly and thoroughly, deep into the pores of your skin.

Cover your entire body with the refreshing, invigorating lather which springs freely and abundantly, in hot or cold water, from Lifebuoy. It's a glorious sensation and it's due largely to the antiseptic Lifebuoy contains.

Lifebuoy Soap has a clean, antiseptic odor which you will recognize at once as typical of purity and safety. This odor completely disappears from your skin in a few moments.

You will feel cleaner than you ever felt before. Its very odor suggests cleanliness. More than this, you will know, for the first time, just how much energy and animation a bath can give you.

You need—everybody needs—this soap for the bath

Because Lifebuoy Soap is not merely a cleanser—getting clean is only half the battle. Lifebuoy has other qualities which make it unique. It contains cocoanut oil which gives it an agreeable, soft "feel" and an abundant lather. It contains red palm oil which has been famous for centuries for its healing properties. These are combined with the antiseptic solution which not only cleanses the skin, but purifies it and destroys the germs.

Use Lifebuoy and have a gloriously clear, wholesome, healthy skin.

The Test

He drew paper and an indelible pencil from his pocket.

"First, how long has Mr. Walter Murray been with you tonight?"

Marion answered, promptly:

"Since half past six o'clock. He came for dinner."

"He has not left you since?"

"Not for a moment."

The girl's throat tightened on the tremendous lie! "What proof of that statement can you bring—in court?"

"The word of the cook, who was told to prepare his favorite dish, and the word of the second maid who waited on table."

Marion spoke calmly, almost lightly. Her mind had fastened on one fact—the fact that a train to New York left at eleven and that she had to make Walter's departure on that train possible, even at the cost of her life.

Lester turned to Darrell.

"You?"

Darrell answered hotly.

"I was not here! But she is lying to save him. Lester, I'll set you up for life if you prevent her perjuring herself in the open court, as she has done tonight!"

"He will confess," confidently replied the detective. "Now, young man—."

Marion interrupted him. Her hands were tightly clenched, to still their trembling, but her voice was astonishingly firm.

"Walter, I see no reason why you or I should be subjected to this! Go to the station, give yourself up, and see the public attitude to both of them when the truth comes out!"

The boy stared at her incredulously. His mind was incapable of conceiving a bluff so terrific, and to him it seemed that she had abandoned all hope.

He rose.

"I'm ready,"—his voice had the calm of despair, and Marion's heart seemed to stop beating in her fear that she had dared too much. But her hint of publicity had alarmed both men. Neither desired to be made the laughing stock of their small community.

"Very good," said the officer, calmly. "If you're afraid to answer my questions—."

"We're not afraid," Marion almost laughed out in her relief. "But we demand that the questions shall have a limit—and they shall be put courteously."

Walter looked at her in admiration. Now he understood. "They shall have a limit," replied the officer. "And if at the end of the test I am about to propose, Mr. Murray here has not incriminated himself, we shall have to look for the—the murderer of Harry Darrell—somewhere else!"

At the word "murderer" a slight shudder shook the boy's frame, and the hands lying on the table were jerked by it. Marion's fingers tightened slightly.

"I will ask you to reply, by naming the word suggested to you by the one I shall speak, thirty times," went on the detective, laying his open watch beside him on the table. "Mr. Darrell—you keep count of seconds, as we have no apparatus!"

He pushed his watch, paper and indelible pencil, to the elder man.

"I will write my own word, before speaking it," he went on, suavely. "All you have to do is note the number of seconds that elapse before the reply is spoken. Miss Darrell, I'll ask you to write down the word he says."

He supplied her with paper, and a third pencil.

"I think that before we have written thirty words, Mr. Murray will have—told us the truth."

The silence that fell upon the quartette was of a quality seldom attained by silence! The ticking of the little clock sprang into a shout. Just as each person lifted the pencil to write, the half hour chimed, and the reverberations might have been those of Big Ben himself, so profound, so intense was the stillness into which those silver notes fell! When the echo—for there was an echo—died away, the detective turned to Walter.

"Please answer in one word," he exhorted: "Just the word suggested to you. Clock?"

"Time," answered Walter, promptly.

"Day?"

"Night."

"Space?"

"Depth."

"Stars?"

"Moon."

"Watch?"

"Picture."

There was no pause in the questioning, or in the answering, but at this juncture it was as if the combatants had ceased preliminary courtesies, and lifted sabres for the first clash.

"Water?"

"Fall."

"Cry?"

"No."

"Pull?"

"Heavy."

"Sink?"

Walter faltered, trembled, then pulled himself together with an immense effort. The detective's eyes snapped in triumph as with a quiver in his voice, and after a noticeable pause, the young man replied, weakly:

"Boat."

Marion's pencil fell from her trembling fingers, but she seized it again, and wrote rapidly.

The boy's eyes were staring in front of him. His forehead was wet with perspiration. His voice seemed to be getting beyond his control. He suddenly realized that he might not any longer be able to decide what words he would say! Something other than himself, yet within himself, was struggling to reply to those words! He was two, not one, any longer.

Lester went on:

"Blood?"

"Bramble."

"Sleeves?"

"Wet."

Walter looked at his own sleeve involuntarily, as he felt the reply forced from him by that other, inimical self within him! With a fierce effort, he braced himself to be more on his guard, and waited for the next word:

"Body?"

Scarcely wavering, the boy's mind dictated:

"Automobile."

Marion's eyes flashed triumph, her hand wrote the long word steadily.

The officer frowned. It was his turn to pause, and the lovers felt the thrill of hope in each other's heart, without daring to glance towards each other.

Lester spoke again: sharply, quickly.

"Drowned?"

Walter hesitated. The shock of the memory recalled by that word—the vision of the heavy body, sinking to its death,—blotted out every other picture, and paralyzed the friendly brain that was on his side. The room, the table, Marion's soothing presence, the fierce, watching eyes of her father, the alert intelligence of the detective, all seemed withdrawn from him, and a space of silence, a cold isolation, walled him from everything but that drowning horror. Yet, once more lashing himself to the conflict, he answered, after what were seconds, yet seemed minutes:

"No one."

He was in a cell of silence now. Mist blurred every object within his vision. A monstrous thing moved in front of him—the pencil with which Marion was being forced to aid his foes. Across the stillness, the ticking of the clock smote heavily.

"Harry Darrell?"

"Dead."

That other self had leaped ahead of him, and answered!

"Drowned?"

He felt that the game was not being played fairly. He had heard that frightful word before. He fought it.

"No."

"Blow?"

"Yes."

He was thinking, as he replied so quickly, of the blow he had received. Too late he realized that his answer hinted of a blow he had given!

"Hate?"

"Yes."

"Fight?"

"Yes."

Marion's pencil stood still. She could no longer write.

"Marion?"

"Help."

He had given up fighting now. That other self had grown monstrously, and forced him back. The pitiless voice went on, but always from a greater and greater distance:

"Run?"

"Yes."

"Here?"

"Yes."

"Wet?"

"Change."

"Hide?"

"Closet."

Marion's pencil fell from her finger. Her

How FOREMEN Are Made

By Elbert Hubbard

SOME weeks ago I gave a lecture in a certain fine little city in the middle West. The Lecture Committee, according to the usual custom, took me around town to show me the points of interest.

We visited the Court House, the First National Bank, the Brickyard, the Hospital, the Jail.

Then they took me to the Electric Light Station—a beautiful concrete structure. The foreman of the Electric Light Station was a young fellow just turned twenty-one. In his buttonhole gleamed a badge of the Jovians, so we met on a Jovian basis.

I noticed that the road leading to the Electric Light Station, off of the main road a quarter of a mile, was being paved with brick.

The foreman incidentally explained that he was doing the job of paving with his own men, "just to fill in the time."

Often such work is given out to contractors. But I saw that this youth was in command of the situation.

I made a few inquiries as to where he came from, and so forth, all of which he side-stepped smilingly, and called my attention to the new dynamo they had just installed.

On the way back to town one of the committee said: "There is a boy you had better keep your eye on. He came here three years ago, and the contractor who was building our plant hired him as water-boy.

"The next week he was time-keeper.

"One night the boss saw him tearing up several yards of red flannel to cover white-light lanterns. They did not have enough red ones to go around, it seems. 'We can't afford to have any suits for damages,' he said, by way of apology.

"That was about the extent of his conversation. He didn't have much to say, but he always did the right thing. He was around early in the morning and was the last one to leave at night.

"It took a year to do the work here, and before the contracting company had pulled up stakes this young fellow was assistant to the boss of the job.

"Whenever the old man went to Chicago he gave all of his orders to this young fellow. No one ever appointed him. He just kind of drifted in.

"Then the contracting company got another job in Keokuk. And when the boss went over to that town he left everything to this young fellow.

"Finally, everything was cleaned up and the plant was running in good shape and we just decided that we would have to keep the boy.

"The boss put in a kick over the telephone, but we stood him off. The boy also thought he would have to go, but we just made him out a little block of stock to the extent of ten thousand dollars. And now he is here for keeps.

"He is part of our equipment, a part of the town. He talks little, minds his own business, gets into no wrangles, feuds or cliques.

"He has studied electricity, and knows as much about running a plant in an economic way as most people. Also, he is encouraging everybody to use the current. He draws plans, makes sketches, gives suggestions.

"Oh, you give him time and he will be a millionaire, all right, all right!"

Sometimes we hear our friends, the reformers, talk about classes and masses.

If there is a capitalistic class in America it evolved mostly from the masses. It is just a process of evolution and natural selection.

Anybody who has a job has a chance.

There is one thing that this country is very short on, and that is men who can intelligently supervise.

Most people, you will find, are looking for positions instead of jobs.

The evolution of this young man that I have just mentioned is typical of the evolution of a great number of the best and strongest men in America.

This boy was born of poor parents. His father, I found out, was a clergyman, on a salary of seven hundred and fifty dollars a year. And on this he had brought up a large family. But this was no disadvantage for the boy.

In any event, I cannot imagine anything more admirable in the line of human evolution than this boy of eighteen carrying water to a band of laborers and gravitating, by divine right, into a position of power, proving his way inch by inch, step by step.

Such successes are not uncommon. They should be much more common than they are.

This is a land of opportunities, and there was never so much demand for strong, able, competent, efficient young men as there is to-day.

The Test

father half rose, but Lester shook his head. Every nerve in the detective's body was throbbing with the joy of the chase—and the chase was not complete without confession.

"Quarrel?"

"Quarrel."

The exhausted brain could no longer frame other words for the idea presented, than the word in which the idea was presented. That was repeated, affirmatively.

"Marion?"

"Marion."

"Picture?"

"Struggle?"

Walter did not reply, because he could not remember the word that had just been said. He gazed stupidly ahead of him, helpless in the hands that held him.

"Court?"

This was so new, so terrible, that the mist cleared and he saw Marion. He felt a ray of comfort as he met her eyes, still brave through their despair. He collected every power that was in him, and answered:

"No."

"Electric chair?"

Walter leaped to his feet. Marion rushed to him.

"Don't answer!" she cried, but it was too late. His words rang across hers:

"I didn't mean to. It was an accident—he rolled—he rolled—."

The mist cleared quite away. He was still standing in the pretty room, and Marion was sobbing in his arms. Darrell rose.

"Telephone for another officer," he said to Lester, who nodded, and rising, walked to the telephone, just outside the door.

But before he reached it, the bell rang. Lester took down the receiver. His face expressed astonishment, even annoyance. Then he smiled grimly:

"All right. I'll tell him."

He put the receiver back, and entered the room. Marion lifted her head from Walter's shoulder, and the three turned

"All our trouble for nothing," he said, curtly. "Mr. Henry Darrell has been worked over for nearly two hours—and has been resuscitated. He declares the whole thing was an accident, for which he was chiefly to blame!"

Guinevere's Lover

priest, never to touch you, never to kiss you, never to hold you in my arms, again, if you will only let me see your worshipped face, and hear your voice, and live in your atmosphere, Guinevere, I would rather be dead than separated altogether."

"Hugh," I answered, my words incoherent with misery. "There would be no use in your promising those things, dear lover, because I am not so strong, I could not so master myself, and the moment would come when I should ask you to take me back into your arms, and break all vows. If the strength of your love for me shows in your willingness to try to crush that which is so strongly one of your attributes, mine for you shows equally in the passionate, mad emotion for you which you fill me with, emotion which is entirely foreign to all my natural feelings, and character, for to all others I am, and always will be, 'ice to the moon.' Hugh, I love you so, I know now, I could never be friends even if you could. So we must part forever in this world, my lover. You must go away again, and use all your will this time to forget me, and then come back and do your duty to your family, and your race. I cannot yet ask you to marry another woman, but that day must come. And as those who take the veil and are dead to the world, I will, I will live on in my prison-house, and do my duty as best I am able to my husband and my son, and, some day, God will give us peace, because our souls will be free, and not blackened with any degradation. Hugh, kiss me a farewell."

And with a sob of agony that still rings in my ears, my lover pressed his lips to mine in a passionate good-bye, and while he still held me to him, Letitia entered the saloon. She stopped for a second with a kindly smile in her eyes, and then she took in the meaning of the situation, and she came toward us, her cheery, glowing face full of sorrow and concern.

"My dear children—" she began, when Hugh interrupted her; he rose to his feet, and I rose, too, and then he took my hand.

"Letitia," he said, "my darling is one of God's angels, and she knows best, and we must part. Be the dear you are, and help us get through the hours till Monday like gentle people. My best, old friend."

And for the first time in her life, that I have ever seen her, my sister sat down upon the sofa and burst into floods of tears.

Time flies, even when it is one long pain, if it is monotonous, the days and weeks go by and leave no mark.

It seemed the first thing which caused me to take any heed of events was when Algernon's Christmas holidays came round that first year. They brought continuous rows and disagreements with his father. The influence of Redwood Moat seemed to reassert itself soon after we returned from Cheshire, and Humphrey resumed his gloomy, irritable manner, when it is impossible to please him. He was strongly resentful of my pale looks. What was the use, he said, of taking me to the sea and giving up a whole month to my amusement, yachting, if as soon as I came back to my home I should begin to droop again and "go white about the gills?"

The astonishing part is that I am not aging much. The intense, unvarying monotony of my life seems to keep everything at a standstill, and but that my eyes are "unfathomable pools of resignation," as Letitia describes them, I am not altered at all, she says. I am glad at this, because in every woman's heart there is a hope that she may long keep that which once pleased her lover.

I do not think I could bear to see him again, and yet I must face the thought, and that other thought, that some day he will marry.

I have once more the strange sensation of waiting for something, an extraordinary expectancy which destroys my numbed peace. It grows so strong at times that I start and glance eagerly at the letters when they come, I know not why, nor what I expect to find. Algernon's summer holidays last year were spent yachting with us on the Guinevere, and, as before, as soon as Humphrey got away from Redwood Moat, his temper and all improved. I do not know anything about what it is which haunts this place, but there is certainly some sinister influence overshadowing it.

Humphrey dislikes staying away from home, and this last autumn was very much crippled with gout again. He was in bed for two days and I sat with him for hours, holding his hand and stroking it. I feel a deep and great pity for him.

"Guinevere," he said after a long si'ence, "I suppose it was a d——d shame my marrying you so young. I think of it as I lie here. How old are you now, child? Hardly thirty-six, and I am getting on for seventy. Well, I have made you as happy as I can, and, fortunately, you are as cold as ice."

"You have always been very good to me, Humphrey," I responded, "and I want to do everything I can to make you happy now."

He pulled me close to him and kissed me.

"If I'd ever been able to make you love me, it would have been all different; but you couldn't help that, nor I either, so we must not encourage snivelling regrets. I thought I should teach you—you were such a child, and I had never had any difficulty with women. But it was a mistake, and now everything is too late."

I put my cheek against his strong old hand and rubbed it, but I could not speak, and to my surprise his hard brown eyes grew glistening and, dragging his hand away from me roughly, and taking a pinch of snuff, he seized his handkerchief and violently blew his nose.

"There, get along, girl," he said. "I am tired, and shall go to sleep."

This evening's post brought a letter from Letitia. She has just gone back to London for the rest of the season after Whitsuntide, and is full in her usual round. The whole of her set and society generally are convulsed, she says, at the advent of one of the most lovely girls anyone has ever seen. She is the daughter of the ruined eccentric Earl Catsby, who twenty years ago married a beautiful American, who died when the girl was born. Letitia says there was some story about the mother, no one appears to remember what; in any case, the girl has been brought up in the wildest way among servants and stable-boys and huntsmen, and then a polish of Paris to finish up. "She is the most modern creature I have ever seen," Letitia writes. "I should think there is nothing of life she does not know. She is as beautiful as a goddess, tall and most voluptuously proportioned, with bright blue eyes, pink and white skin and ripe corn colored golden hair; a perfect mass of frizzy curls everywhere. She has no charm, just a brilliant dash and ruthlessness. She has no brains either, but she has an effect upon every man who comes near her. She interests me in some queer way; she reminds me so of Algernon, for some reason—she has that downright utter want of sentiment he has. She is nineteen. Hilda Flint is taking her out; they are second cousins, so we all see a great deal of her. She does not care in the least what she says, or does, and will rattle out a bete, impossible thing, making everyone squirm, and then she will laugh and show all her row of perfect white teeth and look so divinely that no man minds. I don't know why I am writing all this, Guinevere, as it can't interest you, only, for some strange reason, as I said before, she reminds me of Algernon, a glorious creature without an atom of soul."

I sat a long time thinking over this description. Is it true, then? has Algernon no soul? Oh, my dear boy, what am I to do for him? I am afraid to look ahead, because whatever rushing torrent he plunges into, I am absolutely powerless to prevent him, so things must go on.

Hugh has returned to England. He is in London. Letitia told me this immediately, but since then I have not heard from her for over a fortnight. Humphrey also told me that Hugh had arrived; he heard it at the bench, and there are great rejoicings among his people at Minton Dremont.

"He will surely marry now and settle down," my husband said. "I suppose he was hankering after that Dalison woman, or some other, men are often confounded fools"

Oh, what a poor creature I am that all this should give me such pain.

I tell myself every morning that I must face whatever comes bravely, and I always pray for his happiness, my dear Love, alas, no more to be my lover.

Letitia has written, her letter came by the first post, and before I opened it something made me know it contained eventful news. I read my other correspondence first; there was some feverish reluctance to break the seal of her envelope, but I did at last, and this is what I read:

"I am telling you something, Guinevere, so that you may not presently read news in the paper which may distress you. We have not talked of Hugh in these years, be-

WHY THE 4th of JULY?

Some Curious inaccuracies of Historical Tradition.

WHEN Young America on the Fourth of July indulges in his safe and sane or unsafe and insane celebration, as the case may be, he would probably say that he was celebrating the signing of the Declaration of Independence if anyone asked him the question.

The actual facts are that the Declaration of Independence merely had its first reading before the Continental Congress on July 4th, 1776, and the tentative draft then submitted by the committee previously appointed to draw up such a document was approved by the members present.

No resolution on the subject was passed until July 19th, when it was "Resolved: That the Declaration passed on the fourth be fairly engrossed on parchment, with the title, etc., and that the same, when engrossed, be signed by every member of Congress."

It was not until a date nearly a month later than the day we celebrate, that is, on August 2nd, that the Declaration was signed by the members of Congress then present. Nor did all the signers affix their signatures on that date nor even in that year, although some so-called histories state that they did.

The records of Congress show that Matthew Thornton "a delegate" from New Hampshire, who had not been present at the reading or the signing, presented his credentials on November 4th, 1776, and on that day an act was passed allowing him to sign the Declaration "with the date of his subscription."

And it was not until five years later, in 1781, that Thomas McKean, who was a member from Delaware in 1776 and who had been present at the reading on July 4th of that year, "but absent with the army at the time of general subscription of said instrument on August 2nd," asked that he be permitted to sign. An act was then passed allowing him to affix his signature, "he adding thereto the date of such subscription."

While a very large proportion of Uncle Sam's constituents are of the impression that it is the actual signing of the Declaration that we celebrate on July 4th, a still larger majority are of the idea that this was the only Declaration of Independence from the rule of Great Britain that was made by the colonies and the first one. Both ideas are incorrect.

On May 20th, 1775, over a year before the framing of the Declaration which we treasure, a convention was held at Charlotte and a Declaration of Independence from the rule of the English crown was then signed. The convention was held at midnight and the delegates were representatives of each militia company in the county.

On May 31st the same year the convention passed a series of resolutions defining the government of the county by her own people and not thereafter did the inhabitants recognize the rule of King George. The original document of the Mecklenburg Declaration was, unfortunately, destroyed by fire in 1800 and a "copy" made afterward from memory.

But even this was not the first written Declaration of Independence framed by the colonists. Ante-dating their neighbors in North Carolina by two months the patriots of Harford County, Maryland, met in convention on March 22nd, 1775, at Harford Town which is now called Bush. They agreed to and signed on that day what is probably the very first Declaration of Independence made by the colonies in formal, written form and this document is still in existence.

Guinevere's Lover

cause, as your parting with him was final, there would have been no use in my keeping the flame alight by speaking of him. But I have always felt, dear, that you have not forgotten him. Your little face, Guinevere, is the saddest I know, and the whole thing is a wretched pain to look back upon, and I wish I had never helped you to enjoy life. Your dignity and quiet acceptance of fate and your duty have won my deepest admiration, darling, and perhaps to you, in some way, the past has been worth while. And now I must come to the point, and tell you Hugh is changed. He is forty-one now, and while he still is awfully attractive, more so than ever, perhaps, to the general public, he seems to have lost that something which made him so dear in our happy spring-time. His face is harder and more cynical than it ever used to be, even in the old days before you altered it with your influence. And, he is infatuated with Kathleen, do you remember the girl I told you of? He dined with me the first night after he arrived, and we talked of his future, and he said that Adelaide and Mrs. Forrester—Lily, his younger sister, you know— had never let him alone about marrying, and the whole situation, with Victor Dremont's son's mesalliance, was so sickening that he meant now to look about and find some one sensible and not too young, who would leave him alone. We went on to the theatre very late, and there in a box was Kathleen, surrounded, as usual, by a number of young men. I saw it in a second, she struck that side of him which has slept since Mrs. Dalison's day, the brute side, the side which, in fact, she strikes in all men. I would not introduce him, and I got him to come back to supper with me alone at home, but I knew it was no good. Once a woman has that attraction for a man, angels from heaven are of no use. So, Guinevere, I have just sat back and watched it with sickening disgust, Hilda giving me the private news of it all the time. The girl has been having an affair with a sweet boy in the Guards; no one knows how far it has gone, or if they were secretly engaged, but the moment Hugh and his position and his wealth came on to the horizon, Hilda said she gnashed her white teeth and laughed that metallic laugh of hers and flashed her blue eyes and said:

"'I mean to have this rich old man.'

"I am not sparing you anything, Guinevere, darling, because I want your disgust to cure the pain. Then, Hilda says her cunning has been too wonderful. She has acted the innocent baby, cast the flashing blue eyes down demurely, made everything as difficult for him as she can, and has brought him to a point when he is only waiting for the chance to propose to her. I have not heard, he may have done it already in the last three days. He has avoided me, as you can imagine, and I can not tell him, in any case, all I know of her; because of you my tongue is tied. So we are all powerless, and must just watch him, our dear old friend, going over the weir. Anything more unsuitable than she will be in the role of a great lady at Minton Dremont you cannot imagine, or anyone in character more unsuitable to Hugh, but he is blind and deaf, of course, and only sees her white skin and her golden hair. I won't say any more, dearest. I think it is kindest to cut straight in with a sharp knife. Pull yourself together, darling little sister, and, as ever, come up to the scratch. I am simply sick with disgust and grief.

Your Letitia."

For the first time since my illness four years ago, I was unable to go down to breakfast, and Humphrey actually came up to see me after the second post, which brings the London papers, was in.

He came over and sat on the bed, and, after a casual hope I was all right, brandished the Times. He had the splendid news to impart to me, he said, that Hugh Dremont was going to be married to Lady Kathleen Catsby in a few weeks.

"Isn't it a good thing, Guinevere? I knew you'd be so awfully glad, I climbed up here to tell you at once. He has been thundering quick about it; he only landed in England less than a month ago. Now they will be settled here by the autumn, and we'll have some neighbors again."

Then for a moment my husband's voice seemed afar off, and I was not sure of his words until I saw him bending over me, and caught a rough, kindly whisper:

"I say, Guinevere, you do look pale. I think I'll send for Dr. Burnley, my dear."
